

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Hank

cbw

MEMOIRS

OF THE LATE

THOMAS HOLCROFT,

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF;

AND CONTINUED TO THE TIME OF HIS DEATH,

FROM

HIS DIARY, NOTES, AND OTHER PAPERS.

LONDON:

LONGMAN, BROWN, GREEN, AND LONGMANS.

1852.

Thz 478.10

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY
FROM
THE BEQUEST OF
EVERT JANSEN WENDELL
1913

LONDON:
SPOTTISWOODES and SHAW,
New-street-Square.

PREFACE.

THE difficulties with which genius has frequently to contend in the varied trials of life have rarely been so strikingly exemplified as in the life of Thomas Holcroft. Cradled in poverty, with no education save what he could pick up for himself, amid incessant struggles for bare existence,—by turns a pedlar, a stable boy, a shoemaker, and a strolling player,—he yet contrived to surmount the most untoward circumstances, and at last took his place, among the most distinguished writers of his age, as a novelist, a dramatist, and a translator.

The “Memoirs of Thomas Holcroft” has long been a scarce book ; and it has been thought that this most entertaining biography of a remarkable man cannot fail to be acceptable to the readers of the “Traveller’s Library.”

ADVERTISEMENT.

MR. HOLCROFT had intended, for several years before his death, to write an account of his own life. It is now only to be regretted that he did not begin to execute this design sooner. Few lives have been marked with more striking changes; and no one possessed the qualities necessary for describing them with characteristic liveliness in a greater degree than he did. It often happens that what we most wish done we fail to do, either through fear lest the execution should not answer our expectations, or because the pleasure with which we contemplate a favourite object at a distance, makes us neglect the ordinary means of attaining it. This seems to have been the case with Mr. Holcroft, who did not begin the work he had so long projected, till within a short time of his death. How much he had it at heart may, however, be inferred from the extraordinary pains he then took to make some progress in it. He told his physicians that he did not care what severity of treatment he was subjected to, provided he could live six months longer to complete what he had begun. By dictating a word at a time, he succeeded in bringing it down to his fifteenth year. When the clearness, minuteness, and vividness of what he thus wrote, are compared with the feeble, half-convulsed state in which it was written, it will be difficult to bring a stronger instance of the exertion of resolution and firmness of mind, under such circumstances. The whole of this account is given literally to the public. This part comprises the first seventeen chapters or Book I. The remainder of the Life has been compiled from Mr. Holcroft's Letters; from Journals and other papers to which I had access; from conversations with some of his early and most intimate friends; and from passages in his printed works, relating to his own history and adventures pointed out to me by them. Some of the anecdotes I have also heard mentioned by himself; but these are comparatively few. I first became acquainted with Mr. Holcroft about ten years ago; my chief intercourse with him was within the last three or four years of his life.

WM. HAZLITT.

January, 1810.

MEMOIRS

OF THE LATE

THOMAS HOLCROFT.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER I.

[This and the remaining Chapters of the first Book are in Mr. Holcroft's own words.]

I WAS born in London, in Orange Court, Leicester Fields, on the 10th day of December, 1745, old style; and was baptized and registered in St. Martin's church, where my name is erroneously written Howlcroft. In a will of one of my uncle's, which may be seen in Doctors' Commons, the name is spelt Houldecroft. From this it appears that our family did not pay much attention to subjects of orthography, or think the manner in which their name was spelt, a matter of importance.

Most persons, I believe, retain through life a few strong impressions of very early childhood. I have a recollection of being played with by my parents, when very young, and of the extreme pleasure it gave me. On another occasion, as I and one or two of my brothers or sisters were playing in the court, and kneeling and peeping down a cellar window, where there were some fowls, a shutter that belonged to the window, and was fastened up, by some means or other got loose, and entirely cut off one side of my sister Anne's thumb;—a disaster never afterwards to be forgotten. My father one day whipped me very severely for crying to go to a school in the neighbourhood, where children were sent rather to keep them out of the way, than to learn any thing. He afterwards ordered an apprentice he had to take me to school. This apprentice was an exceedingly hard-featured youth, with thick lips, wide mouth, broad nose, and his face very much marked with the small-pox, but very kind and good-tempered. I perfectly remember his carrying me in my petticoats, consoling me as we went, and giving me something nice to eat. Perhaps I bear his features in mind the more accurately, because I occasionally saw him afterwards, till I was seven or eight years old, when he used to visit my father, who was then under misfortunes. He seldom came without something kind to say, or good to give : but his last and capital gift, too precious to be ever forgotten, consisted of two small books. One was the History of Parismus and Parismenes, and the other, of the Seven Champions of Christendom. These were to me an inestimable treasure, that often brought the rugged, good-natured Dick to my remembrance, with no slight sense of obligation.

Till I was about six years old, my father kept a shoemaker's shop in Orange Court; and I have a faint recollection that my mother dealt in greens and oysters. After I became a man, my father more than once pointed out the house to me : the back of it looks into the King's Mews, and it is now No. 13. My father was fond of speculation, and very adventurous. I believe he had been set up in trade by my uncle John, who lived several years, first as a helper, and afterwards as a groom in the King's stables; where, being an excellent economist, he saved money. For a time, my father, through John's influence, was admitted a helper in the stables; but he did not continue there long, not having his brother's perseverance. How or when he procured the little knowledge of shoe-making which he had, I do not recollect; though I have heard him mention the fact. He was not bred to the trade. He and a numerous family of his brothers and sisters all spent their infancy in the field country; or, as I have heard him describe it, the most desolate part of Lancashire, called Martin's Muir, where my grandfather was a cooper; a man, according to my father's account, possessed of good qualities, but passionate, and a dear lover of Sir John Barleycorn. My grandmother was always mentioned by my father with very great respect.

At the period of which I speak, the west end of London swarmed with chairmen; who, that they might tread more safely, had their shoes made differently from those of other people; to which particular branch of the trade my father applied himself with some shoe-making : he was very fond of horses, and having some knowledge of them, he became a dealer in them. Few persons but the great, at this time kept any sort of carriage. It was common for those who wished to ride out, to hire a horse for the day ; and my father kept several horses for this purpose. If his word was to be taken, they were such as were not very easily to be matched. The praise he bestowed on them for their performances, and his admiration of their make and beauty, were strong and continued. Young as I was, he earnestly wished to see me able to ride. He had a beautiful pony (at least, so he called, and so I thought, it) : but it was not more remarkable for its beauty, than its animation. To hold it, required all my father's strength and skill ; yet he was determined I should mount this pony, and accompany him, whenever he took a ride. For this purpose my petticoats were discarded ; and, as he was fonder of me than even of his horses, nay, or of his pony, he had straps made, and I was buckled to the saddle, with a leading rein fastened to the muzzle of the pony, which he carefully held. These rides, with the oddity of our equipage and appearance, sometimes exposed us to the ridicule of bantering acquaintance ; but I remember no harm that happened.
But he was not satisfied with the profits he acquired by

About the same time my father indulged another whim ; whether he was led to it by any particular accident, I cannot tell. I must have been about five years old, when he put me under the tuition of a player on the violin, who was a public performer of some repute. Either parental fondness led my father to believe, or he was flattered into the supposition, that I had an uncommon aptitude for the art I had been put to learn. I shall never forget the high praises I received, the affirmation that I was a prodigy, and the assurances my teachers gave that I should soon be heard in public. These dreams were never realized.

My father was under great obligations to my uncle John, and was afraid, especially just at that time, of disobliging him. My uncle's pride took the alarm ; and after marking his disapprobation, he asked with contempt, "Do you mean to make a fiddler of the boy?" My practice on the violin therefore ceased ; and it is perhaps worth remarking, that, though I could play so well before I was six years old, I had wholly forgotten the art at the age of seven ; for, after my master left me, I never touched the instrument. In the days of my youthful distress, I have sometimes thought, with bitter regret, of the absurd pride of my uncle.

CHAP. II.

THUS far my infantine life had passed under much more favourable circumstances than are common to the children of the poor. But, when I was about six years old, the scene suddenly changed, a long train of increasing hardships began, and I have no doubt my sufferings were rendered more severe from a consciousness of the little I had suffered till then. This may therefore be properly considered as the first remarkable era in my life.

How far the state of my father's affairs might contribute to the steps he took, is more than I now can tell: but on a sudden the house-keeping broke up, the horses were sold, and we went into Berkshire, somewhat beyond Ascot Heath, about thirty miles from London, where my father had taken a house. What became of his effects, in what manner they were sold, and of every circumstance of that kind, I am totally ignorant.

I suppose the time of our residence in Berkshire to have been about twelve months. The house where we lived, was situated at the corner of the road, the last of a small green, or common, down which the road had a descent. For I remember my father at first had a tall, high-boned hack, on the bare back of which I used, by his order, to gallop down the hill, though I felt great difficulty in keeping my seat. It was in this retired spot that my father himself began to teach me to read. The task at first I found difficult, till the idea one day suddenly seized me of catching all the sounds I had been taught from the arrangement of the letters; and my joy at this amazing discovery was so great, that the recollection of it has never been effaced. After that, my progress was so rapid, that it astonished my father. He boasted of me to every body; and that I might lose no time, the task he set me was eleven chapters a day in the Old Testament. I might indeed have deceived my father by skipping some of the chapters, but a dawning regard for truth, aided by the love I had of reading, and the wonderful histories I sometimes found in the Sacred Writings, generally induced me to go through the whole of my task. One day as I was sitting at the gate with my Bible in my hand, a neighbouring farmer, coming to see my father, asked me if I could read the Bible already? I answered, yes; and he desired me to let him hear me. I began at the place where the book was open, read fluently, and afterwards told him, that if he pleased, he should hear the tenth chapter of Nehemiah. At this he seemed still more amazed, and, wishing to be convinced, bade me read. After listening till he found I could really pronounce the uncouth Hebrew names so much better and more easily than he supposed to be within the power of so young a child, he patted my head, gave me a penny, and said I was an uncommon boy. It would be hard to say whether his praise or his gift was most flattering to me. Soon after, my father's apprentice, the kind-hearted Dick, who came backward and forward to my father on his affairs, brought me the two delightful histories I have above-mentioned, which were among those then called Chapman's Books. It was scarcely possible for any thing to have been more grateful to me than this present. Parismus and Parismenes, with all the adventures detailed in the Seven Champions of Christendom, were soon as familiar to me as my catechism, or the daily prayers I repeated kneeling before my father. Oh, how I loved poor Dick!

My father was an excellent pedestrian, and would often walk to London and back again, more than sixty miles, in the same day. Sometimes he dined at home, and went to London in the afternoon, and even then, I rather think, though I cannot be certain, that he made a point of sleeping in his own house. In height he was about five feet four, perfectly free from corpulency, sober, and satisfied with plain, wholesome diet. He used to speak with great self-complacency of the manner in which he overcame competitors in walking, with whom he sometimes chanced to meet. "I have been overtaken by tall men," he would say, "with whom I could not keep pace, and they have bid me good-bye, and told me they should be in London at such a time before me: but they were every one of them mistaken. They could not proceed without stopping to rest, and taking their pint of beer, their bread and cheese, or whatever they could get to eat and drink. I was never far behind them, I wanted nothing to eat or drink, I was not weary, I passed the houses in which they were sitting, and got forward sometimes more than a mile before them; while they would make another call, perhaps, and another, so that I always arrived before them."

One afternoon, however, he was desirous of going to town at a later hour than usual, and therefore, for expedition's sake, he borrowed a light grey horse of a neighbour, on condition that it should be returned that evening. He then mounted, and placed me behind him, trusting to my courage and good sense for finding my way home with the horse. I know not how far he took me, except that we passed over some part of Ascot Heath, if not all of it; and about an hour before it was dark, he alighted, left me on horseback, and carefully gave me such directions as he supposed I could not mistake. In this he conjectured rightly; I began to trot away, anxious to get home before it was too dark; but unluckily for me, some time after we had parted, with no human being in sight, nor any likelihood of meeting one, the horse stumbled among some ruts, and threw my hat off. To have lost my hat would have been a terrible misfortune; I therefore ventured to alight and pick it up. Then it was that I perceived my distress. I found every attempt I made to remount wholly ineffectual, and all I could do was to endeavour to drag the sluggish animal along, and cry bitterly. Twilight was fast approaching, and I alone on the heath (I knew not how far from home), and never expecting to reach that desired place that evening. At length, however, the white railing of the race course on Ascot Heath came in sight, and I conceived hopes of remounting. Accordingly, I with great difficulty prevailed on my grey nag to stand tolerably nigh the railing, on which I clambered, and with almost unspeakable joy I found myself once more seated on his back. I had another piece of good fortune; for, before I had gone far, a neighbour happened to be passing, who, seeing a child so circumstanced, came up, asked me some questions, heard the story I had to tell, and not only conveyed me safe to the village, but to his own house, where he gave me something comfortable to eat and drink, sent the horse to its right owner, and put me into the charge of some one, who took me home.*

I know nothing that tends so much as the anecdotes of childhood, when faithfully recorded, to guide the philosopher through that very abstruse but important labyrinth, the gradations that lead to the full stature, peculiar form, temperament, character, and qualities of the man. I am therefore anxious to recount all those concerning myself, which I suppose may conduce to this purpose.

My father was very fond, and not a little vain, of me. He delighted to show how much I was superior to other children, and this propensity had sometimes a good effect. One evening when it was quite dark, day-light having entirely disappeared, and the night being cloudy, he was boasting to a neighbour of my courage; and his companion seeming rather to doubt, my father replied, he would put it immediately to the proof. "Tom," said he, "you must go to the house of Farmer such-a-one," (I well remember the walk, but not the name of the person,) "and ask whether he goes to London to-morrow." I was startled, but durst not dispute his authority, it was too great over me, besides that my vanity to prove my valour was not a little excited: accordingly, I took my hat and immediately obeyed.

* Mr. Holcroft has made use of this incident in the first volume of Hugh Trevor.

The house I was sent to, as far as I can remember, must have been between a quarter and half a mile distant; and the road that led to it, was by the side of the hedge on the left hand of the common. However, I knew the way well enough, and proceeded; but it was with many stops, starts, and fears. It may be proper to observe here, that although I could not have been without courage, yet I was really, when a child, exceedingly apprehensive, and full of superstition. When I saw magpies, it denoted good or ill luck, according as they did or did not cross me. When walking, I pored for pins, or rusty nails; which, if they lay in certain directions, foreboded some misfortune. Many such whims possessed my brain; I was therefore not at all free from notions of this kind, on the present occasion. However, I went forward on my errand, humming, whistling, and looking as carefully as I could; now and then making a false step, which helped to relieve me, for it obliged me to attend to the road. When I came to the farmhouse, I delivered my message. "Bless me, child," cried the people within, "have you come this dark night all alone?" "Oh yes," I said, assuming an air of self-consequence. "And who sent you?" "My father wanted to know," I replied equivocally. One of them then offered to take me home, but of this I would by no means admit. My whole little stock of vanity was roused, and I hastily scampered out of the house, and was hidden in the dark. My return was something, but not much less alarming than my journey thither. At last I got safely home, glad to be rid of my fears, and inwardly not a little elated with my success. "Did you hear or see anybody, Tom," said my father, "as you went or came back?" "No," said I, "it was quite dark; not but I thought once or twice, I did hear something behind me." In fact, it was my father and his companion, who had followed me at a little distance. This, my father, in fondly praising me for my courage, some time after told me.

CHAP. III.

ALL that I now recollect more of this residence in Berkshire is, that my father, after having been from home longer than usual, put a sudden, and to me unexpected, end to it—took me with him, and for some time travelled round the country.

The first place I distinctly remember myself, was London, where I have a faint notion of having been among boys with their school books. Whether I was sent to school for a week or two, while my father and mother were adjusting their affairs, and preparing for their new career, is more than I can affirm or deny: though I have no recollection of acquiring any knowledge, a thing which, before this, had begun to make a strong impression on me. If I were really sent to school, it must have been for a very short time, nor could I have been provided with books or other means of improvement. And, indeed, my father was so straitened in his circumstances, that my mother very soon after agreed to turn pedlar, hung a basket with pins, needles, tape, garters, and other small haberdashery, on her arm, and hawked them through the outskirts and neighbourhood of London, while I trotted after her. I might at first perhaps feel some disgust at this employment: but use soon reconciled me to it, as the following anecdote will show.

I cannot say what my father's employment was, while I and my mother were, what they emphatically called tramping the villages, to hawk our pedlary. It may be presumed, however, that it was not very lucrative, for he soon after left it, and he and my mother went into the country, hawking their small wares, and dragging me after them. They went first to Cambridge, and afterwards, as their hopes of success led them, traversed the neighbouring villages. Among these, we came to one which I thought most remarkably clean, well built, and unlike villages in general: my father said it was the handsomest in the kingdom. We must have been very poor, however, and hard driven on this occasion: for here it was that I was either encouraged, or commanded, one day to go by myself from house to house, and beg. Young as I was, I had considerable readiness in making out a story, and on this day, my little inventive faculties shone forth with much brilliancy. I told one story at one house, another at another, and continued to vary my tale just as the suggestions arose: the consequence of which was, that I moved the good country people exceedingly. One called me a poor fatherless child: another exclaimed, "what a pity! I had so much sense!" a third patted my head, and prayed God to preserve me, that I might make a good man. And most of them contributed either by scraps of meat, farthings, bread and cheese, or other homely offers, to enrich me, and send me away with my pockets loaded. I joyfully brought as much of my stores as I could carry, to the place of rendezvous my parents had appointed, where I astonished them by again reciting the false tales I had so readily invented. My father, whose passions were easily moved, felt no little conflict of mind as I proceeded. I can now, in imagination, see the working of his features. "God bless the boy! I never heard the like!" Then turning to my mother, he exclaimed with great earnestness—"This must not be! the poor child will become a common-place liar! A hedge-side rogue!—He will learn to pilfer!—Turn a confirmed vagrant!—Go on the highway when he is older, and get hanged. He shall never go on such errands again." How fortunate for me in this respect that I had such a father! He was driven by extreme poverty, restless anxiety, and a brain too prone to sanguine expectation, into many absurdities, which were but the harbingers of fresh misfortunes: but he had as much integrity and honesty of heart as perhaps any man in the kingdom, who had had no greater advantages. It pleases me now to recollect, that, though I had a consciousness that my talents could keep my parents from want, I had a still stronger sense of the justice of my father's remarks. As it happened, I had not only read and remembered the consequences of good and evil, as they are pointed out in the Scriptures, but I had also become acquainted with some of the renowned heroes of fable; and to be a liar, a rogue, and get hanged, did not square well with the confused ideas I had either of goodness or greatness, or with my notions of a hero.

From the vicinity of Cambridge, we passed on to the Isle of Ely, hawking our different wares, pins, laces, tempting ribbons, and garters, in every village we came to; arriving first at Peterborough, and afterwards taking care to be present at Wisbeach fair. Markets, fairs, and wakes, were indeed the great objects which regulated all our motions.

The Isle of Ely, from its marshy nature, is much infested by the reptile tribes. One day, as we were pushing forward through the grass by the road side, I saw what I imagined to be a beautiful ribbon, striped and spotted with various colours, but chiefly blue and white; and with great surprise, catching hold of my mother's arm, I cried, "Look, mammy, look!" No less admiring what she saw than myself, and equally mistaken, — "Bless me," said she, "how pretty!" Then stooping to take it up, she touched it; but our surprise now greatly increased, when a large snake uncoiled itself, darted forward, and in a moment was out of sight. My father was much amused at the terror we felt. He had lived for some time with a farmer, and knew the difference between the adder and common snake tribes, with the harmless nature of the latter. For in summer and autumn, whenever he could come upon a sleeping snake, he made it his diversion to catch it by the tail, shake it when it attempted to rise, and bring it with him wherever he was going. A country woman, with whom we met shortly after, told us that the breed of snakes was so common in those parts, that they could not be kept out of their cottages, where they frequently took shelter, especially in the night.

The things of which I have the most distinct recollection as connected with the Isle of Ely, are its marshy lands, multiplied ditches, long broad grass, low and numerous draining mills, with the cathedral of Peterborough, which I thought beautiful; but above all, those then dear and delightful creatures, a quack doctor, peeping from behind his curtain, and that droll devil, his merry Andrew, apparitions first beheld by me at Wisbeach fair. It was a pleasure so unexpected, so exquisite, so rich and rare, that I followed the merry Andrew and his drummer through the streets, gliding under arms and between legs, never long together three yards apart from him; almost bursting with laughter at his extreme comicality; tracing the gridirons, punchinellos, and pantomime figures on his jacket; wondering at the manner in which he twirled his hat in the air, and again caught it so dexterously on his head. My curiosity did not abate, when he examined to see if there was not some little devil hid within it, with a grotesque squint of his eyes, twist of his nose, and the exclamation, "Oh, ho! have I caught you, Mr. Imp?" — making a snatch at the inside of his hat, grasping at something, opening his hand, finding nothing in it, and then crying, with a stupid stare,—“No, you see, good folks, the devil of any devil is here!” Then again, when he returned to the stage, followed by an eager crowd, and in an imperious tone was ordered by his master to mount,—to see the comical jump he gave, alighting half upright, roaring with pretended pain, pressing his hip, declaring he had put out his collar bone, crying to his master to come and cure it, receiving a kick, springing up and making a somerset; thanking his master kindly for making him well; yet the moment his back was turned, mocking him with wry faces; answering the doctor, whom I should have thought extremely witty, if Andrew had not been there, with jokes so opposite and whimsical as never failed to produce roars of laughter. All this was to me assuredly, “the feast of reason and the flow of soul!” As it was the first scene of the kind I had ever witnessed, so it was the most ecstatic. I think it by no means improbable, that an ardent love of the dramatic art took root in my mind from the incidents of that day.

CHAP. IV.

THERE are short periods of my life, during which, when endeavouring to retrace them, I am surprised to find I can scarcely recollect anything of what happened, and this was one of them. How we got from the Isle of Ely,—where we went,—what we did,—the reasons that induced my father and mother to forsake the business of pedlars,—whether he returned to London for a short time, and again sat down to what he called his trade, namely, that of making, or rather mending shoes,—are questions which I cannot answer. This interval, though not very long, must have been of some duration; for the first remarkable fact that presents itself to my mind, is the strong recollection I have of being at Coventry, walking with my little sister in my arms in a large desolate back yard, at the outskirts of the city. Through this yard, a deep, open common sewer ran, into which my sister either sprang or fell by accident, where she must almost instantly have been suffocated, had not I, instead of being terrified, and running to call for help, immediately threw myself on the ground, and dragged her safely out. I ran, at once terrified and rejoiced, to tell my father and mother what had happened, and was rewarded by the praises I received from them for the good sense and intrepidity I had shown. It has been my good fortune to have saved more lives than one, but this was the first.

In and of Coventry itself, I remember several little traits and incidents. I was much taken with the virtue, beauty, and magnanimity of Lady Godiva : — the misfortune that befel Peeping Tom, was a fine mark of Divine justice ; and I was equally delighted to think that all the people had bread enough, as I supposed, when the oppressive toll was taken off. Coventry Cross was then standing, and though greatly dilapidated, made no little impression on my imagination, as I walked round and round it, and gazed at its spiral forms, commensurate proportions, numerous little recesses and figures, though half destroyed, that suggested ideas of beauty, sanctity, and the events of past times. Not that I would have it supposed that these ideas passed individually and distinctly through the mind of an uninstructed boy, little more than eight years old, but the effect of them altogether was such as I have here described.

My father, though active and of a strong constitution, was short, slight-built, and wholly unable to contend with men in general. But he was passionate, and free-spoken if he thought himself ill-used, and had thus given offence to a powerful, brutal rival in the market, by whom he was treated with great contempt, and threatened with personal chastisement. I well remember the grief and indignation I then felt that my father should be thus degraded ; and that he, I, and all belonging to him, should be unable to redress his wrongs.

This happened on a market-day ; and I believe it was on the same day that my father, thinking me almost perished with the cold, gave me a pint of ale to drink, which so far inebriated me, that I was quite ashamed. My father himself was a man of such sobriety, that I had heard him often declare that he had never in his life been overcome with liquor. Besides, I loved religious books, and they all informed me drunkenness was a great sin. I therefore took it very much to heart, that I should so early have been guilty of a crime of which he was entirely innocent. However, he consoled me by taking the blame upon himself for giving me more to drink than I could be supposed able to bear.

It was here that I saw a person of a very odd and almost unaccountable appearance. I could not discover whether he was young or old ; for he seemed to be both. The size of his limbs, the form of his body, the colour of his hair and face, were such as might have belonged to a boy of eighteen ; and to correspond with these he had something of sprightliness in his manner ; but his gait and deportment were those of old age ; he stooped in the shoulders, and he had the greatest number of small wrinkles in his face that I have ever seen. The reason why I mention many of these (in themselves perhaps insignificant) circumstances, is, that the inquiring reader may be able to trace the bent and progress of my mind, and how far I was prone to observation.

CHAP. V.

HAVING been bred to an employment for which he was very ill-fitted, both from his physical and mental powers and propensities, the habit that became most rooted in, and most fatal to my father, was a fickleness of disposition, a thorough persuasion, after he had tried one means of providing for himself and family for a certain time, that he had discovered another far more profitable and secure. Steadiness of pursuit was a virtue at which he could never arrive ; and I believe few men in the kingdom had in the course of their lives been the hucksters of so many small wares ; or more enterprising dealers in articles of a halfpenny value.

Different circumstances have fixed in my mind the recollection of many of the towns to which we went, and a variety of the articles of my father's traffic, but in all probability not a tenth part of either. I at this moment remember in particular, a market-day at Macclesfield in Cheshire ; not so much from what we sold, though I believe it was some sort of wooden ware, of which trenchers and spoons were in those days staple articles, as from a person that caught my attention there. This was a most robust and boisterous woman, more than middle aged, with a very visible beard, and a deep bass voice. I was never weary of listening to, looking at, her, and watching all she said or did. I could scarcely think it possible there was such a woman.

I should mention, that to carry on these itinerant trades, my father had begun with purchasing an ass, and bought more as he could ; now and then increasing his store by the addition of a ragged poney, or a worn-out, weather-beaten Rozinante. In autumn he turned his attention to fruit, and conveyed apples and pears in hampers from villages to market-towns ; among the latter of which I remember, were Tamworth, Newark-upon-Trent, and Hinckley. The bad nourishment I met with, the cold and wretched manner in which I was clothed, and the excessive weariness I endured in following these animals day after day, and being obliged to drive creatures perhaps still more weary than myself, were miseries much too great, and loaded my little heart with sorrows far too pungent ever to be forgotten. Bye roads and high roads were alike to be traversed, but the former far the oftenest, for they were then almost innumerable, and the state of them in winter would scarcely at present be believed.—Speaking of scantiness of diet, an incident happened to me which shows the great power of taste, or rather of imagination, over the appetite, and which ought to be treasured in the memory of those who endeavour to force the appetites of children. I was travelling after my father in Staffordshire near Wosely bridge, where a country-gentleman had a seat. I went into the house, whether alone or for what purpose I totally forget ; but I well remember the fragrant steams of the kitchen, and the longing wishes they excited. As I was going away, a good-natured servant said, “ Perhaps you are hungry, little boy ? ” To which bashfully hanging my head, I answered, “ Yes.” “ Well, then, stop a minute, I’ll give you something very nice : ” and accordingly, a large basin of rich pease-soup was brought me, and a spoon. I had never eaten, nor perhaps heard of such a thing before ; but the moment I smelt it, and applied it to my palate, I conceived such an excessive dislike to it, that though I felt ashamed, and made every effort I could, I found it impossible to swallow a spoonful. Some servants were by my side, and one of them asked, “ What ! don’t you like it ? Can’t you eat it ? ” To which, perfectly abashed, and again hanging my head, I replied, “ No.” “ Ha ! ” said one of them, “ you are a dainty chap, however, I wonder who keeps you, or what it is you do like ! ” I made no reply, but, hungry as I was, and wretchedly disappointed, hurried away as fast as I could, to overtake my father. I should remark, that since I have grown up, pease-soup has always been a favourite dish with me ; perhaps, accustomed as I had been from childhood to the plainest food, and empty as my stomach then was, this high flavoured composition would unavoidably excite disgust.

My father became by turns, a collector and vender of rags, a hardwareman, a dealer in buckles, buttons, and pewter-spoons; in short, a trafficker in whatever could bring gain. But there was one thing which fixed his attention longer than any other, and which therefore, I suppose he found the most lucrative; which was, to fetch pottery from the neighbourhood of Stone, in Staffordshire, and to hawk it through all the North of England. Of all other travelling, this was the most continual, the most severe, and the most intolerable. Derbyshire, Cheshire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, Warwickshire, the towns and cities of Birmingham, Walsall, Wolverhampton, Coventry, Derby, Burton-upon-Trent, Litchfield, Tamworth, Atherstone, Nuneaton, Lutterworth, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, nay, as far up as Warwick, Stratford-upon-Avon, Daventry, Northampton, Newport-Pagnell, Banbury, (I well remember its delicious cakes); and on the east, Stamford in Lincolnshire, Grantham, and in short every place within possible reach, or where pottery might be sold, received visits from my father, the asses, and poor me.

What became of my mother, during these excursions, I do not accurately recollect, except that she was with us occasionally, as at Macclesfield for instance, where the woman with the beard and bass voice so fixed my attention. She was also with us at Litchfield and Coventry. Most probably she was in general left at home, with her child or children.

By home, I mean an old house half in ruins, about two miles on the north-east side of Rugeley, with a kitchen-garden, paddock, and croft, which afforded some scanty supplies to man and beast, when my father found it convenient, or thought proper, to rest a little from his labours; but to me this house often became a den of misery. I was not yet nine years old, but I had a variety of employments. First, I was the messenger of the family to Rugeley, whither I took money, and brought back delicious white bread, for which it was then famous, with such minor articles as were wanted. But when trusted by myself, I could not help loitering on the road, diverting myself with whatever caught my attention, and examining every new object with an idle, boyish curiosity, from which I derived little profit. So that a journey, which ought to have been performed in less than two hours, generally took me more than half a day. I knew the consequences, and had a kind of horror of them, yet could not resist, could not prevail upon myself to go straight forward ; such was the united force of habit and curiosity.

My father was alike extreme in his anger, and in his compassion. He used to beat me, pull my hair up by the roots, and drag me by the ears along the ground, till they ran with blood. Indeed my repeated faults were so unpardonable, that he could scarcely blame himself. Yet probably within an hour after he had exercised his severity upon me, he would break out into passionate exclamations of fondness, alarming himself lest he should some time or other do me a serious mischief, and declaring that rather than so, he would a thousand times prefer instant death.

Chastisements like these were grievous, but they were by no means the whole of what I had to encounter. I know not how it happened, but at this early age I was intrusted with business rather like an adult than a child.

Towards Litchfield, on the right, lay Cannock heath and town ; and adjoining to this heath, on the left, there were coal-pits situated in a remarkably heavy clay country : (I speak from childish recollection, and may therefore expect to be pardoned, should I in description commit any local errors ; as I have never been at Cannock, the coal-pits, or the heath, since that period). Desirous of employing his asses, yet averse to go himself (I know not for what reason), my father frequently sent me to these coal-pits to get a single ass loaded, and to drive him over the heath to Rugeley, there to find a customer for my coals. The article was so cheap, and so near, that the profits could be but very small, yet they were something. Had the weather been fine when I was sent on these errands, the task would not have been so difficult, nor the wonder so great ; but at the time I was unfortunately sent there, I have a perfect recollection of deep ruts, of cattle, both asses and horses, unable to drag their legs through the clay, and of carts and wag-gons that were set fast in it. I do not mean that these accidents happened every day, but they were common to the place : and to poor helpless me, with a creature that could scarcely stand under its burden, they were not less frequent than to others. When any body that could assist me happened to be near, I thought myself in luck ; but if I was obliged to run from coal-pit to coal-pit, to request the man who turned the wheel to come and help me, the chance of compliance was little. I often got nothing but a surly curse and a denial ; so till some unlooked-for accident brought me relief, there my loaded ass, sometimes heaving a groan at what he suffered, was obliged to stay.

The most remarkable instance of this kind of distress may perhaps deserve recounting. One day, my ass had passed safely through the clay ruts and deep roads, and under my guidance had begun to ascend a hill we had to cross on Cannock heath on our way to Rugeley. The wind was very high ; though while we were on low ground, I had never suspected its real force. But my apprehensions began to increase with our ascent ; and when on the summit of the hill, nearly opposite to two clumps of trees, which are pictured to my imagination as they stood there at that time, it blew gust after gust, too powerful for the loaded animal to resist, and down it came. Through life I have always had a strong sense of the grief and utter despair I then felt. But what a little surprises me is that I have no recollection whatever of the means by which I found relief, but rather of the naked and desolate place in which I was, and my inability to help myself. Could I have unloaded the ass, it would not have been much matter ; but the coals were brought from the pit in such masses, that three of them were generally an ass load ; any one of which was usually beyond my strength. I have no doubt, however, but I got them by some means or other to Rugeley, and brought the money for them safe to my father, whom I could not help secretly accusing of insensibility, though that was the very reverse of his character.

The coal-pits were situated on the extremity of an old forest, inhabited by large quantities of red deer. At these I always stopped to look : but what surprised and delighted me most was the noble stag ; for to him the deer appeared insignificant. Him I often saw bounding along, eyeing objects without fear, and making prodigious leaps over obstacles that opposed his passage. In this free state, indeed, he cannot but excite our admiration.

One little anecdote I must not omit. The reader will naturally suppose that from the time I began to travel the country with my father and mother, I had little leisure or opportunity to acquire any knowledge by reading. I was too much pressed by fatigue, hunger, cold, and nakedness. Still however I cannot but suppose, as well from my own propensity to obey the will of God, as from my father's wish to encourage my inclinations of this kind, that I continued to repeat my prayers and catechism morning and even- ing, and on Sundays to read the prayer-book and Bible. At a rate, I had not forgotten to read; for while we were at the house near Rugeley, by some means or other, the song of Chevy Chase came into my possession, which I read over with great delight at our fire-side. My father, who knew that my memory was tolerably retentive, and saw the great number of stanzas the ballad contained, said to me, "Well, Tom, can you get that song by heart?" To this question I very readily answered, "Yes." "In how long time?"—"Why, you know, father, I have got such work for to-morrow, and what work you will set me for the following days, can't tell; however, I can get it in three days." "What, perfectly?" "Yes." "Well, if you do that, I'll give you a half penny." Rejoiced at my father's generosity, "Oh then, never fear," said I. I scarcely need add, that my task was easily accomplished, and that I then had the valuable sum of a halfpenny at my own disposal.

CHAP. VI.

THERE was a single instance in which I travelled on foot thirty miles in one day. Whether the miles were measured or computed is a circumstance which I now forget: but the roads were so heavy, owing to a strong clay soil, that the last quarter of a mile I had to go, I was obliged to confess I could walk no farther, and I was carried on a countryman's shoulders. All those who heard of this, and knew how young, how slight of limb, and stunted in my growth was, expressed their astonishment, and some their doubts. I think this happened before I was ten years of age.

My father broke up his little establishment near Rugeley, and took me with him into Cheshire, but left me at a village two or three miles from Haslem, where I was entrusted to the care of an old woman, who kept a lodging-house, and whom, from the whole of her appearance, as well as her kindness to me, I always remembered with respect. On the evening of my arrival, but later, two travelling Irishmen came in, and were admitted as lodgers. My father had bargained with the old woman, that she was to provide for me: travellers, of course, who come in at sunset, and depart at day-break, provide for themselves, or are obliged to be satisfied with what such barren abodes can supply. The Irishmen ha provided a halfpenny roll between them ; what they might have more I do not know. But my good old dame they noticed to be mashing up a plentiful supper of new milk and potatoes for me, a dish in which their hearts delighted. Whether it was contrivance, accident, or according to rule, I cannot say ; we did not, however, sup in the presence of the old woman, but in the room in which we all three slept. No sooner were we here, and I had begun in imagination to devour my delicate mashed potatoes, than the Irishmen came up to me, patted my cheeks, told me what a pretty little boy I was, asked me my name, inquired who took care of me, and to what country I was going ; and swore by the holy father they never in all their lives saw so sweet a looking boy, and so compliant and good-tempered. "Do now," said one of them, "let me taste of your mashed potatoes." "Aye, and me too," said the other — "I warrand you don't much care about them ! We, now, are a dale more used to them in Ireland : I'm sure you'll be very glad to make an exchange. Here now, here is a very fine half-penny roll, which is very nice ating, and which, to be sure, we bought for our own supper. 'To be sure, we should be fond enough of it, but we don't care about trifles ; and as we have been used to ate potatoes all the days of our lives, and you English all like bread, why if you plase, my sweet compliable fillow, we will just make a little bit of a swap, and so we shall all ate our suppers heartily." The action followed the word ; they took my potatoes, and gave me the dry roll : while I, totally disconcerted, and not a little overawed by the wildness of my fellow-lodgers' looks, the strangeness of their brogue, their red whiskers, dark beards, carrotty wigs, and sparkling black eyes, said not a word, but quietly submitted, though I thoroughly regretted the dainty supper I had lost, and saw them devour it with an aching heart.

Whenever I write dialogues like these, it is not to be supposed that I pretend to repeat word for word what was said : after the lapse of so many years, such a pretension would on the face of it be absurd. But I do on all such occasions pretend to give a true picture of the impressions that still remain on my mind, to express the tone and spirit in which the words were spoken, and in general to repeat a part of the words themselves. — I cannot too seriously declare that I write these memoirs with a conscious desire to say nothing but the pure truth ; the chief intention of them being to excite an ardent emulation in the breasts of youthful readers, by showing them how difficulties may be endured, how they may be overcome, and how they may at last contribute, as a school of instruction, to bring forth hidden talent.

CHAP. VII.

NEXT morning early the Irishmen pursued their journey ; and when my father returned, I told him in the hearing of our well-meaning old hostess how I had been tricked out of my supper. They immediately joined in reviling the whole Irish nation, concluding, as "the great vulgar and the small" generally do on such occasions, that these two fellows, with the cunning kind of robbery they had committed, exhibited a faithful picture of Ireland and Irishmen. Till corrected either by great experience, or conscientious inquiry, the human mind has an almost invincible propensity, when any vice which most excites disgust or contempt is remarked in an individual of a particular country, to affirm that it could belong to no one else, and to ascribe it as a general characteristic to the nation at large.

I believe that my father's intentions, when we left Cheshire, were to seclude himself for a time, by working at the shoe-making business ; and that for this purpose he took a circuitous route, with a determination to settle at whatever market town he should find there was a probability of getting employment. This pursuit led us to Northwich, Knutsford, Congleton, Macclesfield, Sheffield, Chappel-in-le-Frith, in which country the scenery astonished me, and where I was particularly struck with three conic barren rocks, which, I remarked to my father, were like three sugar loaves. We also went to Buxton, Bakewell, Chesterfield, and Mansfield, where sickness detained us for a time. This sickness was a mutual and dangerous fever, which we caught, either by our being unable to reach a lodging-house, or to pay for a lodging, and by our sleeping, in consequence, under a damp hedge, an imprudence that had nearly proved fatal to us ; nor have I ever ceased at intervals to feel its effects. Some time after our recovery from the fever, I was seized by an asthma, which became so violent, that it was only occasionally I dared venture from the house. I can give no account how we were maintained, while we were at Mansfield, nor of the means by which we recovered ; but I have a perfect picture before me, of a decent, cleanly house, good attendance, and countenances that were kind and cheerful. At the same time, I have no recollection of conceiving ourselves indebted to charity, or of being under any apprehensions of future want ; so that I can hardly suppose that the circumstance which first occasioned our illness, arose from pecuniary distress.

After we had recovered sufficient strength, our next remove was to Nottingham, where we lodged in a house not far from the park, with the castle in view, and the brook that winds along the low grounds beneath the height on which it is built. A game which I do not remember to have seen played any where else, and which afforded me no little pleasure, was that of two men having each a round bright ball of iron or steel, to which they had the art of giving an elastic right-line direction along the pathway through the Park ; and which, if I am not mistaken, they called playing at long bowls, he who could first attain the goal being the winner. Spell and null, bandy, prison-bars, and other field games, in the address or the activity of which my little heart delighted, long before I was permitted to be a partaker in them, were here among the diversions of the summer evening.

In many parts, Nottingham is, as I then thought it, a very fine town. To me, who had seen so many, its market-place seemed to claim an undoubted and high superiority. Situated on a gently rising ground, that soon becomes dry after showers, surrounded by inns, shops, and other buildings, and well supplied with almost every article, it is among the largest, most convenient, and handsomest in England. A little beyond it were two remarkable inns, the White Lion, and the Blackamoor's Head ; each possessed of vast cellerage, wines of I know not what age, with viands, beds, and other conveniences, such as it gave me the greatest satisfaction to hear described.

One of our four principal rivers, the noble Trent, flows through the meadows below the town, at no very great distance. The scenery round it, to my boyish apprehension, was grand. When the day and the stream were clear, I have often taken a particular pleasure in watching the shoals of fish of the smaller kind in which it abounded, or in now and then catching a glimpse of some of greater magnitude, or in seeing them brought on shore by the dexterous angler. A village, called the Hermitage, lay on its banks, and thither I delighted to walk, because it was connected with circumstances which interested my imagination. Here, as well as in other places in the outskirts of the town, there were houses cut in the rock ; and I could not but fancy them to have been formerly inhabited by a venerable and holy brotherhood of Hermits. These houses were indeed to me objects of the greatest curiosity. I could never cease admiring that men should persevere in hewing themselves out such habitations, and that they should turn a thing so barren to so much use and profit ; for these rocks were in fact high banks of sand-stone, and on the top of them, that is, on the roofs of their houses, each man had his garden.

I walked much about at Nottingham in company with my father, to whom I was very eager to communicate all my juvenile pleasures, and of whom I also made constant inquiries with respect to the objects we saw. He, however, could oftener make conjectures than give information. I imagine his reason for taking me thus into the air, was, as he hoped, to arrest the progress of the asthma, which daily increased, and became alarming ; for there were times when I could not walk above a few yards without standing still to recover breath. Such medical people as my father could obtain access to, were consulted ; but the general opinion was, that unless youth and growth should relieve me, the disease was for life. An intelligent surgeon happened to think otherwise : he entertained hopes, he said, provided an issue was made, and carefully kept open on the inside of each leg below the knee. My father accepted his offer to perforate the skin, and direct me in dressing the issues ; for to my known prudence this care was readily committed. The success of the remedy equalled the expectations of the surgeon. The cure, aided no doubt by my youth and cheerful temperament, was progressively visible from week to week, and my joy and thankfulness to my medical guide were great. Whoever he was, I certainly owe him much ; but I have forgotten his name. This must have happened in the year 1756 or 1757, but I believe the latter.

CHAP. VIII.

PUBLIC sights, even though cruel, have been, through all ages, the delight of the herd of mankind. The sessions were just over, and a malefactor, who had been sentenced to death, was left by the judge for execution. My father proposed that we should accompany the crowd, and see what was to be seen. To this I consented; we followed the cart to the gallows, which stood at some distance from the town; and by talking with each other, listening to remarks that were made, some of them charitable, others tainted with a revengeful spirit, and by frequently stopping to observe the agitation of the poor wretch whose life was so soon to cease, I was thrown into a very pensive state of mind. However, taking my father by the hand, I patiently waited the awful moment when the cap was drawn over the culprit's eyes, and he was suddenly lifted into the air. Here his convulsive struggles, to my young and apprehensive imagination, were intolerable: I soon turned my eyes away, unable to look any longer; and my father, seeing the pain I was in, said, "Come, Tom, let us go." "Oh yes, yes, father, as fast as we can," was my reply. The effect on my mind was such, that I made, as I suppose, the first fixed resolution of my life, and declared it in a tone that denoted how determined I was, — "Never again, while I live," said I, "will I go and see a malefactor put to death." Five or six and twenty years afterwards, I thought it an act of duty to change this determination when I was first at Paris in the year 1783. Through life, however, when hanging, and the various ways in which men exterminate each other, have been talked of, I have rarely, if ever, forgotten the poor dying culprit of Nottingham.

It should seem that men have at all times had the good sense to contrast their melancholy and often disgusting institutions with others of an opposite tendency; and that seldom fail in the very nature of them to revive the sickening heart, and give it animation and delight.

The time of Nottingham races drew near. My father was a great lover of horses, as I have said; and from his discourse, as well as the little I had seen of these noble animals, I was eager to become better acquainted with them. My father recapitulated the different places at which he had seen horses run, recounted the names of the famous winners he had known, and filled up the picture with the accidents common on such occasions, the amazing cunning of sharpers, the punishments inflicted on some of their detected rogueries; the cries of the betting chair, the tumult of the crowd when the horses were running, the danger of being too near the course, with the difficulty of keeping it clear, the multitude of gaming and drinking booths, and all that variety of delightful commotion which was calculated to gratify my boyish fancy. The whole scene was like enchantment; and all my wishes were now centered in its being realised.

Ten days or a fortnight before the time, straggling horses for the different plates began to drop in; and of course to take their morning and evening exercise on the course, where they might be seen. This was a pleasure not to be neglected either by me or my father. I was delighted with the fineness of their limbs, their glossy coats; and not a little amused, when following them from exercise to the stable, if I were but allowed to take a peep, and see how their body-clothes were managed, how the currying and brushing of them was performed, their high straw beds prepared, their long hay carefully chosen, and their oats sifted and re-sifted. Every thing about a race-horse is precious: but I pitied them for being so much stinted in their food, and especially when my father told me it must daily decrease, and that the night before they started they must fast.

But the great and glorious part which Nottingham held in the annals of racing this year, arose from the prize of the King's Plate, which was to be contended for by the two horses which every body I heard speak considered as undoubtedly the best in England, and perhaps equal to any that had ever been known, Childers alone excepted. Their names were, Careless and Atlas. Careless, who had been bred by a worthy and popular Baronet of the county (I forget his name), was the decided favourite of every man in Nottingham, gentle or simple. The prowess and equal, if not superior, merit of Atlas, were very boldly asserted by strangers, and particularly by jockeys, betterers, and men of the turf. If I do not mistake, Atlas was the property of, and bred by, the Duke of Devonshire. However, he had received a previous defeat in running against Careless; and this defeat the men of Nottingham considered as little less than a certainty of future victory. The opposite party affirmed that Atlas, being a remarkably powerful horse (I think seventeen hands high), had not then attained his full force. There was a story in circulation concerning him, which if true deserved to be remembered. He was a full bred horse out of the Duke's own stud, and consequently was intended for training: but being unwieldy when foaled, and as he grew up becoming still more so, he was rejected on account of his size and clumsiness, and banished to the cart breed. Among these inferiors he remained, till by some accident, either of playfulness or fright, several of them started together, and the vast advantage of Atlas in speed happening to be noticed, it was then thought proper by the grooms to restore him to his blood companions.

Of those who in the least amused or busied themselves with such affairs, Careless and Atlas occupied the whole discourse. Many people who seemed to reason plausibly enough on the subject, affirmed that if any thing lost the race to Careless, it would be the inferior skill of his rider, by whom neither the ground nor the powers of the horse would be well economised; he was merely the groom of a country gentleman. When the race was over, these accusations were vociferated with wearisome reiteration.

On the appointed day, however, they both started for the King's Plate; and I believe there was scarcely a heart on the race-course that did not swell with hope and fear. As for my own little one, it was all in rapture for Careless. He was so finely made, his coat was so bright, his eye so beaming, his limbs so animated, and every motion seemed so evidently to declare, "I can fly, if I please," that I could not endure the thought of his being conquered. Alas, for the men of Nottingham, conquered he was! I forget whether it was at two or three heats, but there was many an empty purse on that night, and many a sorrowful heart.

CHAP. IX.

THESE different incidents had raised a strong desire in my mind to be better acquainted with a subject that had given to me, and as I thought to every body, so much emotion, and I began to consider what might be done. At that time I was rather a burden to my father than a help. I believe I assisted him a little in the mending of shoes, but my asthma, till very lately, as well as my youth, had prevented my making much progress. At one time indeed I had been persuaded, though much against my will, to become apprentice to a stocking-weaver; but this, I forget how, broke off, at which I was very glad: I did not like stocking-weaving. The question now occurred to me, whether it would not be possible to procure the place of a stable-boy, at Newmarket. I was at this time in point of clothing in a very mean, not to say ragged condition, and in other respects, was not much better off. The stable-boys I saw at Nottingham, were healthy, clean, well fed, well clothed, and remarkable rather for their impudence, than seeming to live under any kind of fear or hardship. Except their impudence, I liked every thing else I saw about them; and concluded that if I could obtain so high a situation as this, I should be very fortunate.

These reflections preyed so much upon my mind, that I was at last induced to mention them to my father; and he having a predilection for every thing belonging to a horse, and therefore a high respect for this, the noblest state of that animal's existence, readily fell into my views, and only feared they could not be accomplished. He resolved however that trial should be made; and after inquiring among the jockeys, thought it advisable to apply to a Mr. Woodcock, who kept stables four or five miles from Newmarket, where he trained horses entrusted to his care. Mr. Woodcock examined me, asked my age, found I was light of weight, and, as I suppose, liking the answers I gave to his questions, to our very great joy, agreed to take me upon trial. In the course of my life, there have been several changes, that each in their turn greatly affected my spirits, and gave me advantages far beyond what I had ever before enjoyed: of these gradual elevations, this was the first. I should now be somebody. I should be entrusted with the management of one of that race of creatures that were the most admired and beloved by me: I should be well clothed, wear a livery, which would show I belonged to one of the great: I should not only have food enough, but of that kind which was highly relishing to the appetite of youth; and, in addition to all this, should receive an annual stipend. I jumped, as it were, from a precarious and mean existence, where I could not tell what worse might happen, into a permanent and agreeable employment. I had only to learn to ride, and perform the duties of a stable boy, of which I had no fear, for I supposed them far less difficult than I afterwards found they were.

The grooms that reside at, and in the vicinity of, this famed town, are all more or less acquainted with each other; and on Mr. Woodcock's recommendation, I was put under the care of Jack Clarke, who lived with Captain Vernon, he having luckily a led horse, which I was to mount. The day of parting with my father, and of beginning our journey, was an anxious one. He could not too emphatically repeat the few well-meant precepts he had so often given me, nor I too earnestly assure him, I would love and obey him all my life. Notwithstanding his severity, he was passionately fond of me, my heart entered into the same feelings, and there was great and unfeigned affection between us.

CHAP. X.

As is the custom in travelling with trained horses, we set off early, and walked without hurry. When we stopped to breakfast, the plenty of excellent cold beef, bread and cheese, with the best table-beer, and as much as we pleased, gave me a foretaste of the fortunate change I had made. This indeed exceeded my utmost expectations,—I was entering upon a new existence,—was delighted, full of hope, and cheerful alacrity, yet too timid to be presumptuous. Clarke being a good-tempered lad, and seeing me happy, attempted to play me no tricks whatever. On the contrary, he gave me all the caution and advice he could, to guard me against being drawn into the common-place deceptions, most of them nasty, many of them unhealthy, and all of them tending to make the poor tyro a common laughing-stock, uniformly practised by the resident boys upon every new comer. I do not recollect one-half these tricks: but that with which they begin, if I do not mistake, is to persuade their victim that the first thing necessary for a well-trained stable-boy, is to borrow as many waistcoats as he can, and in the morning after he has dressed and fed his horse, to put them all on, take a race of perhaps two or three miles, return home, strip himself stark naked, and immediately be covered up in the hot dung-hill; which they assure him is the method the grooms take when they sweat themselves down to ride a race. Should the poor fellow follow their directions, they conclude the joke with pailfuls of cold water, which stand ready to throw over him.

Another of their diversions used to be that of hunting the owl, which is already very whimsically described in a book of much humour, and tolerably well-known, called "Tim Bobbin's Lancashire Dialect." To catch the owl, is to persuade a booby that there is an owl found at roost in the corner of a barn; that a ladder must be placed against a hole, through which, when the persons within should be pleased to hoot and hunt him, he must necessarily fly, as the barn door is shut, and every other outlet closed: that the boy chosen to catch the owl must mount this ladder on the outside, and the purblind animal, they say, will fly directly into his hat. When the owl-catcher is persuaded to all this, and mounts to his post, the game begins: hallooing and absurd noises are made; the fellow within diverts themselves with laughing at what is to come, and pretending to call to one another to drive the owl from this place to that; while two or three of them approach nearer and nearer to the hole, when they discharge the contents of their full tubs and pails on the head of the expecting owl-catcher, who is generally precipitated from his ladder to some soft, but not very agreeable preparation below.

Clarke warned me against several other of the games at which I should be invited to play; in most of which there was some whim, but a great deal more of that dirty wit in which ill-bred boys are known to delight. Clarke, however, did me this essential service, that he not only taught me to avoid all the snares he mentioned, but rendered me so wary, that all the time I was among this mischievous crew, I was never once entrapped by them. At times they occasionally expressed great wonder; perhaps, had they known the secret, they would have taken their revenge on Clarke.

The weather through the whole of our journey was fine, the ride highly agreeable, and the instruction and information I received from Clarke, made it still more pleasant to me. The only place I can distinctly remember having passed through and made a short stay at, was Huntingdon.

CHAP. XI.

As I have said, Mr. Woodcock resided in the vicinity of Newmarket, at the distance of three or four miles; and to the house where he lived Clarke immediately took me, gave up his charge and we parted, I believe with mutual good-will; at least, my feelings towards him were grateful and friendly. As a thing of course, there must have been stables belonging to the house of Mr. Woodcock, but I cannot recollect what train he had under him and, to say the truth, I cannot fix upon any one figure, man, boy, or animal, except a grey filly, on the back of which I was put, and which I was entrusted with the care of.

I doubt if Mr. Woodcock was at home on my arrival. His family was small, and had the air of being genteel. It consisted of himself, his wife, and their daughter, who was about eleven years old. All that I can now recollect of Mrs. and Miss Woodcock, is, having seen them very neatly dressed in white, that the mother assumed a very superior but obliging manner, and that I stood much in awe of her. Trees were thinly scattered to some distance round the house; the parlour was very neat, and rather spacious. In this I received one of those early lessons in moral honesty, which produce a greater effect on the mind of a child, or even of a youth, than is generally supposed. One afternoon, the tea-things and sugar-bason being set out in the parlour before Mrs. and Miss Woodcock had come down, I was passing the door, and that delicious bait of boyhood, a fine lump of sugar, caught my eye. I looked, considered, looked again, saw nobody, found it irresistible, and venturing, step by step, on tiptoe, seized the tempting prize, thinking myself secure; but as I turned back to hasten away with it, the first object that struck me was a young gentleman, stretched either on a chair or sofa behind the door, with a book in his hand, a look directed to me, and a smile on his countenance. I cannot express the shame I felt; but I immediately returned the sugar to its place, cast down my eyes, and slunk away, most heartily mortified, especially when the young gentleman's smile broke out into a laugh.

I forgot to mention, though it will easily be supposed, that when I entered on my new profession, my dress was changed, and I was made to look something like a stable-boy.

Miss Woodcock was a very neat little girl, and it somehow happened, though I know not by what means, that I soon got rather in favour with her. She would whisper with me when we met near the house, chide me, if she saw what she thought an impropriety, and once or twice condescended to be half or quite angry with me, while I did all in my power to please her. These trifling advances, however, which spoke rather the innocence of the age, than the intention of the mind, were soon put an end to by an accident that had nearly proved fatal to me.

Perfectly a novice as I was, though I could sit with seeming safety on a quiet horse, I neither knew how to keep a firm seat nor suddenly to seize one; and I was almost certain of being thrown if any thing that was but a little violent or uncommon happened. I was walking the dark grey filly quite a foot-pace in the fore when in an instant something startled her, and made her spring aside; by which I was not only unseated and thrown, but, unfortunately for me, my foot hung in the stirrup; her fright was increased, she began to kick and plunge violently, and I received a blow in the stomach, which, though it freed me from the stirrup, left me, as was supposed, for no inconsiderable time, dead. Somebody, I imagine, was riding with me, for the alarm was soon given. I was taken up, carried home, treated with great humanity, and by bleeding and other medical means, signs of life at length became visible. All that I myself recollect of a circumstance so very serious, and so very near being mortal, was, that I was thrown, kicked, and dreadfully frightened; that some time afterwards I found myself very ill in bed, in a very neat chamber, and that I was spoken to and attended with great kindness till my recovery.

This accident, however, put an end to my jockeyship in the service of Mr. Woodcock: he discovered, a little too late, that the dark grey filly and I could not be trusted safely together. But though he turned me away, he did not desert me. He recommended me to the service of a little deformed groom, remarkable long in the fork, I think of the name of Johnstone, who was esteemed an excellent rider, and had a string of no less than thirteen famous horses, the property of the Duke of Grafton under his care. This was acknowledged to be a service of great repute; but the shrewd little groom soon discovered that I had a better trade to learn, and I was again dismissed.

After this new disappointment, I felt perhaps a more serious alarm than is usual with boys at such an age. For, independent of natural sensibility, I had seen so much of the world, had so often been entrusted with its petty affairs, depended so much upon my ability to act for myself, and had been so confident in my assurances to my father that I ran no risk in venturing alone into the world, that my fears were not trifling when I found myself so far from him, thrown out of place, and convicted of being unable to perform the task I had so inconsiderately undertaken. Mr. Johnstone told me I must endeavour to get a place, but that for his part he could say little in my favour; however, he would suffer me to remain a few days among the boys. My despondency was the greater, because, the morning before, when a horse that I was riding shook himself in his saddle, as horses are sometimes observed to do, I fell from his back as much terrified as if he had been rearing, plunging, and kicking. To hardy grooms, and boys that delight in playing the braggart, this was a truly ridiculous instance of cowardice, and was repeated with no little malignity and laughter.

CHAP. XII.

THE unforeseen relief that has been given to misfortune under circumstances apparently quite hopeless, has frequently been remarked, and not seldom affirmed to be an incontestible proof of a particular providence.

I know not where I got the information, nor how, but in the very height of my distress, I heard that Mr. John Watson, training and riding groom to Captain Vernon, a gentleman of acute notoriety on the turf, and in partnership with the then Lord March, afterwards Duke of Queensberry, was in want of, but just then found it difficult to procure, a stable-boy. To make this pleasing intelligence still more welcome, the general character of John Watson was that, though he was one of the first grooms in Newmarket, he was remarkable for being good-tempered; yet the manner in which he disciplined his boys, though mild, was effectual, and few were in better repute. One consequence of this, however, was, that if any lad was dismissed by John Watson, it was not easy for him to find a place.

With him Jack Clarke lived, the lad with whom I came from Nottingham: this was another fortunate circumstance, and contributed to inspire me with confidence. My present hopes were so strongly contrasted with my late fears, that they were indeed enviable. To speak for once in metaphor, I had been as one of those who walk in the shadow of the valley of death: an accidental beam of the sun broke forth, and I had a beatific view of heaven.

It was no difficult matter to meet with John Watson; he was so attentive to stable-hours, that, except on extraordinary occasions, he was always to be found. Being first careful to make myself look as much like a stable-boy as I could, I came at the hour of four (the summer hour for opening the afternoon stables, giving a slight feed of oats, and going out to evening exercise), and ventured to ask if I could see John Watson. The immediate answer was in the affirmative. John Watson came, looked at me with serious, but good-natured, countenance, and accosted me first with "Well, my lad, what is your business? I suppose I can guess you want a place?" "Yes, sir." "Who have you lived with?" "Mr. Woodcock, on the forest; one of your boys, Jack Clark brought me with him from Nottingham." "How came you to leave Mr. Woodcock?" "I had a sad fall from an iron-grey fill that almost killed me." "That is bad indeed! and so you leave him?" "He turned me away, sir." "That is honest; I like you speaking the truth. So you are come from him to me?" At this question I cast my eyes down, and hesitated, then fearfully answered, "No, sir." "No! what, change masters twice in so short a time?" "I can't help it, sir, if I am turned away." This last answer made him smile. "Where are you now, then?" "Mr. Johnstone gave me leave to stay with the boys a few days." "That is a good sign. I suppose you mean little Mr. Johnstone at the other end of the town?" "Yes, sir." "Well, as you have been so short a time in the stables, I am not surprised he should turn you away; he would have every body about him as clever as himself; they must all know their business thoroughly. However, they must learn it somewhere. I will venture to give you a trial, but I must first inquire your character of my good friends, Woodcock and Johnstone. Come to-morrow morning at nine, and you shall have an answer."

It may well be supposed I did not forget the appointment; and fortunate one I found it, for I was accepted on trial at four pounds or guineas a year, with the usual livery clothing. My stable was immediately assigned me. Here was a remarkably quiet three-years old colt, lately from the discipline of the breaker; and of him I was ordered to take charge, instructed by one of the upper boys in every thing that was to be done, and directed to back him and keep pace with the rest, when they went to exercise only taking care to keep a strait line, and to walk, canter, and gallop the last. Fortunately for me his temper appeared to be quiet (for he had been put into full training at an early age), though I found not the least difficulty in managing him. My reputation therefore, among the boys, which is an essential circumstance, suffered no stain.

I ought to mention, that though I have spoken of Mr. Johnstone, and may do of more Misters among the grooms, it is only because I have forgotten their christian names; for, to the best of my recollection, when I was at Newmarket, it was the invariable practice to denominate each groom by his christian and surname, unless any one happened to possess some peculiarity that marked him. For instance, I remember a little man in years, grown timid from age, but otherwise supposed to be the best rider in England, and remarkable for his knowledge of almost every race-course, whose name, I think, was William Cheevers; and of whom it was the custom to speak, by calling him Old Will, The Old One, and the like. I mention this, as it may be now, or hereafter, a distinctive mark of the changes of manners. I know not what appellations are given to grooms at Newmarket at the present day, but at the time I speak of, if any grooms had been called Misters, my master would certainly have been among the number; and his constant appellation by every body, except his own boys, who called him John, was simply John Watson.

With respect to me, his conduct seems to show that he understood my character better than the grooms who had judged of it before: as I did not long ride a quiet colt at the tail of the string (on whose back he soon put a new-comer), but had a dun horse, by no means a tame or safe one, committed to my care. Instead of timidity, he must have remarked various traits of courage in me, before he would have ventured on this step. In corroboration of this, I may cite the following proof. I continued to ride the dun horse through the winter. It was John Watson's general practice to exercise his horses over the flat, and up Cambridge hill, on the west side of Newmarket: but the rule was not invariable. One wintry day he ordered us up to the Bury hills. It mizzled a very sharp sleet, the wind became uncommonly cutting, and Dun (the horse I rode), being remarkable for a tender skin, found the wind and the sleet, which blew directly up his nostrils, so very painful, that it suddenly made him outrageous. He started from the rank in which he was walking, tried to unseat me, endeavoured to set off full speed; and when he found he could not master me so as to get head, began to rear, snorted most violently, threw out behind, plunged, and used every mischievous exertion of which the muscular powers of a blood-horse are capable. I, who felt the uneasiness he suffered before his violence began, being luckily prepared, sat firm, as steady and upright as if this had been his usual exercise. John Watson was riding beside his horses, and a groom, I believe it was old Cheevers, broke out into an exclamation — “By G—d, John, that is a fine lad!”

“Aye, aye,” replied Watson, highly satisfied, “you will find some time or other there are few in Newmarket that will match him.” To have behaved with true courage, and to meet with applause like this, especially from John Watson, was a triumph, such as I could at this time have felt in no other way with the same sweet satisfaction. My horsemanship had been seen by all the boys, — my praises had been heard by them all.

It will not be amiss here to remark that boys with straight legs, small calves, and knees that project but little, seldom become excellent riders. I, on the contrary, was somewhat bow-legged, I had then the custom of turning in my toes, and my knees were protuberant. I soon learned that the safe hold for sitting steady was to keep the knee and the calf of the leg strongly pressed against the side of the animal that endeavours to unhorse you; and as little accidents afford frequent occasions to remind the boys of this rule, it becomes so rooted in the memory of the intelligent, that their danger is comparatively trifling.

Of the temperaments and habits of blood-horses there are great varieties, and those very strongly contrasted. The majority of them are playful, but their gambols are dangerous to the timid or unskilful. They are all easily and suddenly alarmed, when any thing they do not understand forcibly catches their attention, and they are then to be feared by the bad horseman, and carefully guarded against by the good. Very serious accidents have happened to the best. But, besides their general disposition to playfulness, there is a great propensity in them to become what the jockeys call vicious. High bred, hot in blood, exercised, fed, and dressed so as to bring that heat to perfection, their tender skins at all times subject to a sharp curry-comb, hard brushing, and when they take sweats, to scraping with wooden instruments, it cannot be but that they are frequently and exceedingly irritated. Intending to make themselves felt and feared, they will watch their opportunity to bite, stamp, or kick; I mean those among them that are vicious. Tom, the brother of Jack Clarke, after sweating a grey horse that belonged to Lord March, with whom he lived, while he was either scraping or dressing him, was seized by the animal by the shoulder, lifted from the ground, and carried two or three hundred yards before the horse loosened his hold. Old Forester, a horse that belonged to Captain Vernon, all the while I remained at Newmarket, was obliged to be kept apart, and being foundered, to live at grass, where he was confined to a close paddock. Except Tom Watson, a younger brother of John, he would suffer no lad to come near him: if in his paddock, he would run furiously at the first person that approached, and if in the stable, would kick and assault every one within his reach. Horses of this kind seem always to select their favourite boy. Tom Watson, indeed, had attained to man's estate, and in his brother's absence, which was rare, acted as superintendent. Horses, commonly speaking, are of a friendly and generous nature; but there are anecdotes of the malignant and savage ferocity of some, that are scarcely to be credited: at least many such are traditional at Newmarket.

Of their friendly disposition towards their keepers, there is a trait known to every boy that has the care of any one of them, which ought not to be omitted. The custom is to rise very early, even between two and three in the morning, when the days lengthen. In the course of the day, horses and boys have much to do. About half after eight, perhaps, in the evening, the horse has his last feed of oats, which he generally stands to enjoy in the centre of his smooth, carefully made bed of clean long straw, and by the side of him the weary boy will often lie down: it being held as a maxim, a rule without exception, that were he to lie even till morning, the horse would never lie down himself, but stand still, careful to do his keeper no harm. I should add, however, that the boy must keep awake, not for fear of the horse, but of the mischievous disposition of his comrades. Should sleep happen to overcome him, some lad will take one of those tough ashen plants with which they ride, and, measuring his aim, strike him with all his force, and endeavour to make the longest weal he possibly can, on the leg of the sleeper. I remember to have been so punished once, when the blow, I concluded, was given by Tom Watson, as I thought no other boy in the stable could have made so large a weal; it reached from the knee to the instep, and was of a finger's

CHAP. XIII.

THERE are few trades or professions, each of which uniform mode of life peculiar to it, subject only to variations as are incidental and temporary. This ob particularly applicable to the life of a stable-boy.

All the boys in the stable rise at the same hour, fr two in spring, to between four and five in the depth The horses hear them when they awaken each other, to denote their eagerness to be fed. Being dressed, the with carefully clearing out the manger, and giving a f which he is obliged no less carefully to sift. He then dress the litter ; that is, to shake the bed on which th been lying, remove whatever is wet or unclean, and l maining straw in the stable for another time. The w are then thoroughly swept, the few places for fresh open, the great heat of the stable gradually cooled, an having ended his first feed, is roughly cleaned and d about half an hour after they begin, or a little better have been rubbed down, and re clothed, saddled, each his stall, then bridled, mounted, and the whole string morning exercise ; he that leads being the first, fo knows his place.

Except by accident, the race-horse never trots. He walk or gallop ; and in exercise, even when it is the gallop begins slowly and gradually, and increases till nearly at full speed. When he has galloped half-a-m begins to push him forward, without relaxation, for ar mile. This is at the period when the horses are in fi to which they come by degrees. The boy that can b these degrees among those of light weight, is general lead the gallop ; that is, he goes first out of the stab returns.

In the time of long exercise, this is the first brus. A brushing gallop signifies that the horses are nearly before it is over, and it is commonly made at last rat Having all pulled up, the horses stand some two or th and recover their wind ; they then leisurely descend t take a long walk ; after which they are brought to we

this, as in every thing else (at least as soon as long exercise begins), every thing to them is measured. The boy counts the number of times the horse swallows when he drinks, and allows him to take no more gulps than the groom orders, the fewest in the hardest exercise, and one horse more or less than another, according to the judgment of the groom. After watering, a gentle gallop is taken, and after that, another walk of considerable length; to which succeeds the second and last brushing gallop, which is by far the most severe. When it is over, another pause, thoroughly to recover their wind, is allowed them, their last walk is begun, the limits of which are prescribed, and it ends in directing their ride homewards.

The morning's exercise often extends to four hours, and the evening's to much about the same time. Being once in the stable, each lad begins his labour. He leads the horse into his stall, ties him up, rubs down his legs with straw, takes off his saddle and body clothes; curries him carefully; then, with both curry-comb and brush, never leaves him till he has thoroughly cleaned his skin, so that neither spot nor wet, nor any appearance of neglect, may be seen about him. The horse is then reclothed, and suffered to repose for some time, which is first employed in gratifying his hunger, and recovering from his weariness. All this is performed, and the stables are once more shut up, about nine o'clock.

Accustomed to this life, the boys are very little overcome by fatigue, except that early in the morning they may be drowsy. I have sometimes fallen slightly asleep at the beginning of the first brushing gallop. But if they are not weary, they are hungry, and they make themselves ample amends for all they have done. Nothing perhaps can exceed the enjoyment of a stable-boy's breakfast: what, then, may not be said of mine, who had so long been used to suffer hunger, and so seldom found the means of satisfying it? Our breakfast consisted of new milk, or milk porridge, then the cold meat of the preceding day, most exquisite Gloucester cheese, fine white bread, and concluded with plentiful draughts of table-beer. All this did not overload the stomach, or in the least deprive me of my youthful activity, except that, like others, I might sometimes take a nap for an hour, after so small a portion of sleep.

For my own part, so total and striking was the change which had taken place in my situation, that I could not but feel it very sensibly. I was more conscious of it than most boys would have been, and therefore not a little satisfied. The former part of my life had most of it been spent in turmoil, and often in singular wretchedness. I had been exposed to every want, every weariness, and every occasion of despondency, except that such poor sufferings become reconciled to, and almost insensible of, suffering, and beggary are, fortunately, not prone to despond. Had I had been the meal where I had enough; rich to me was the blanket that kept me warm; and heavenly the pillow, no matter what, how hard, on which I could lay my head to sleep. Now I was warmly clothed, nay gorgeously, for I was proud of my new liveries, and never suspected that there was disgrace in it; I fed voluptuously, not a prince on earth, perhaps, with half the appetite, and never failing relish; and instead of being obliged to drag through dirt after the most sluggish, obstinate, and despised among animals, I was mounted on the noblest that the earth contains, and I was under his care, and was borne by him over hill and dale, outstripping the wings of the wind. Was not this a change, such as might excite reflection even in the mind of a boy!

Boys, when at full liberty, and thus kept in health and exercise, are eager at play. The games most common at Newmarket, were five, spell and null, marbles, chuck-farthing, and spinning tops, which, as well as marbles and fives, I excelled. Another game called holes, was occasionally played by a few of the boys. This was a game of some little study, and was much delighted in by the shepherd boys and men, who tended their flocks on that vast plain (as then it was) on which Newmarket stood. Three squares were cut in the earth, one within the other, in each side of which were three holes. Each antagonist had nine warriors or bits of stick to combat the opposing nine. What the rules of the game were I have forgotten; but I believe the most essential of them was, that he was the victor who could imprison his adversary's men, or leave them no further space to move in. If the choice of the move was given, I and other good players knew how to win at this game with certainty. Till I discovered the secret, I was greatly devoted to the game.

In order to have fair play allowed me at these different games I had my little infant labours of Hercules to perform; or, to speak more properly and plainly, to fight my way, and convince all boys of my own age I was not to be cowed by them. All boys are wranglers; and out of this propensity the elder boys at Newmarket take pleasure in creating themselves diversion. J

Clarke, who was about seventeen, was a very good-natured, peaceable lad: but all the others in our stable were very assiduous in exciting the little ones to quarrel, and persuading him, who would have wished to remain at peace, to believe he must, certainly, be a coward. This stigma I was not willing to be loaded with: the consequence was, that battle after battle was fought, first between me and Jack, and then between me and Tom, for two of us were so named. Jack had been a shepherd boy, was older by some months than myself, preceded me as a jockey, was a most inveterate, obstinate, and unfair antagonist, for he would bite, kick, or do anything to gain the victory, was quite as strong as myself, and excessively hardy. However, he entirely wanted method and presence of mind; and after three or four desperate contests, he was obliged fairly to own he was not my equal. Tom, who came into the service after me, was likewise older, larger-limbed, and had more strength; but my conquest of him was much more easy. He had bones, sinews, and thews, as Shakspeare says, but little heart; he was prevailed on to venture a second combat, but not a third. I had the good fortune also to face and outface those among Lord March's boys, who lived opposite to us, and with whom we had continual intercourse; so that, though I was but thirteen, I became the acknowledged hero among the boys of both stables under fifteen years of age. Thus much for the footing on which I stood with my rivals within the first half-year after I came to live with John Watson. It must be remembered, that all the tricks of which Jack Clarke had warned me, had been tried upon me in vain. These things, together with my aptitude at play, soon placed me as the leading boy of the young fry.

From nine o'clock in the morning till four, the whole time is at the boy's own disposal, except that of breakfasting and dining, which he is seldom apt to think ill employed. But in summer, spring, and autumn, the stables are again opened at four, and woe to him who is absent! I never was but once, when, unfortunately, Captain Vernon himself happened to arrive at Newmarket. I never saw John Watson so angry with me before or afterwards; though even then, after giving me four or five strokes across the shoulders with an ashen plant, he threw it away in disgust, and exclaimed, as he turned from me, — "D—n the boy! On such a day!"

The business to be done in the afternoon is but a repetition, with little or no variety, of that which I have described for the morning, except that they return to stables at seven, or earlier, again dress their horses, give them a first feed to supper themselves, give a second feed, prepare the horse pick and prepare the hay with which they sup, and by nine the stables are once more shut up, containing both horse and boys.

CHAP. XIV.

THE time I remained at Newmarket was upwards of two and a half; during which many things occurred worthy of remembrance; and though in their nature dissimilar, yet all tend to have that influence on character, by which, if my poor philosophy holds good, character is progressively formed. Instead of these different accidents as they occurred, I shall rather endeavour to collect them into classes, beginning with those that immediately belong to the business of a jockey.

I have already remarked, how necessary it is for the besotted man never to be off his guard. At the time the little accident I am going to relate happened, and which I could not but consider as rather disgraceful, I was so persuaded of being all the while alert, and of my power of instantaneously recovering, that I supposed what followed to be nearly an impossibility. The horse that I then rode happened to be unwell; and did not do his morning and evening exercise with the others. I was therefore, ordered to walk him out a couple of hours in the middle of the day, to canter him gently, give him a certain quantity of food, and canter and walk him home again. The horse was weak, and apt to start or play tricks of an uncommon kind: besides, unwell, and dull in spirits, and I was more than usually unsuspicious of accident. After a walk and a very gentle canter I brought him to water. Our watering troughs stood by the side of the Devil's Ditch, on the side next to Newmarket. In seeing any possible danger, I held the reins quite slack, and sat upright in my seat, but rested on one thigh; when, without any warning, a grey rook, of the species common in the plain, ascended, on the wing, up the ditch within half a yard of the ground, and in a direction that would scarcely have missed the horse's head. At this sudden apparition, an arrow from ld hardly exceed the velocity with which he darted round to id his enemy; and the impulse was so unforeseen, and so sistible, that I, and my whole stock of self-confidence and self-ecit, lay humbled in the dust. I was greatly afraid, lest my race should be witnessed by any one, and particularly that the se should make for home: however, his fright ceasing, and his lth not disposing him to be wanton, he easily suffered himself to aught, and mounted, and my honour received no stain.

felt this accident the more, because I was at this very time iving new marks of confidence in my talents. A horse bred reland had been brought into our train: John Watson did not k proper to let a boy of heavy weight back him, and among e of light weight, I was the only one in whom he durst confide. as for this horse that I quitted the Dun horse, on whose back ad obtained such praise, and upon him the other boy of the e of Tom was mounted; but only for two or three mornings. a immediately discovered he was Tom's master, and would not p up in the gallop, but would go what pace he pleased: if ck, he began to plunge, kick, and rear; threw his rider, and le all the boys laugh and hoot at him, and thoroughly exposed to mortification.—I was frequently obliged to change my horse, it was always for one more difficult to manage; and not only but I generally preserved an honour that had been early con- ed on me, that of leading the gallop, let me ride what horse I uld. At one of these changes, I was transferred to the back of ittle mare, which had long been ridden by Jack Clarke, who s wanted for a horse of more power, but of less spirit. On , too, I led the gallop. She was not so much vicious as full of y. Whenever I pleased, when the gallop was begun, by a turn the arm, and a pretended flourish, I could make her start out of line, clap her head between her legs, fling her hind heels in air, and begin to cut capers. This excitement was generally ficient for the whole string, who would start off one after ther, each playing his gambols, and perhaps one or two of m throwing their riders. Under such a temptation for triumph, as perhaps as prudent as could be expected from a boy of my ; but when John Watson did not happen to be with us, I could t always resist the vanity of showing that I was equal to the st of them, and quite before the majority. When John was ent, the bad riders would sometimes, before I began the gallop, very humbly intreat me not to play them any tricks; as they did, I was good-natured enough to comply.

In every stud of horses, there are frequent changes their qualities are discovered, one horse is rejected, and perhaps a stranger, bought and admitted. It happened, on occasion, that a little horse was brought us from another whence he had been rejected for being unmanageable. He shown himself restive, and, besides the snaffle, was rich in check-rein. I was immediately placed on his back, and seemed rather more extraordinary, ordered to lead the horse as usual. I do not know how it happened, but under me he had very little disposition to be refractory, and whenever trouble occurred, it was soon overcome: that he was, however, for an opportunity to do mischief, the following incident will cover. Our time for hard exercise had begun perhaps a month or three weeks. As that proceeds, the boys are less and each having less suspicion of his horse. I was leading the horse one morning, and had gone more than half the way toward foot of Cambridge hill, when something induced me to speak to a boy behind me; for which purpose I rather turned myself, and, as I looked back, rested on my left thigh. The traitor no sooner felt the precarious seat I had taken, than he suddenly plunged from the path, had his head between his heels in the air, and exerting all his power of bodily exertion, flung me from the saddle with only one foot in the stirrup, both my legs on the off side. I immediately heard the shouts of boys behind shouting triumphantly, "A calf, a calf!" of contempt for a boy that is thrown. Though the horse was in the midst of his wild antics, and increasing his pace to the utmost as far as the tricks he was playing would permit, still finding a foot in the stirrup, I replied to their shouts by a whisper to myself, "It is no calf yet." The horse took the usual course up Cambridge hill, and now rather increased his speed and mischievous tricks. This opportunity I took with that of spirit which is peculiar to boys; and, notwithstanding the digressing speed and irregular motion of the horse, threw myself over the saddle. It was with the utmost difficulty I could maintain my balance, but I did: though by this effort I lost hold of my reins, both my feet were out of the stirrups, and the horse at that moment was entirely his own master. But my grand object gained: I was once more firmly seated, the reins and the stirrups were recovered. In a twinkling, the horse, instead of being pulled up, was urged to his utmost speed; and when he came to the end of the gallop, he stopped of himself with a very good will, as he was heartily breathed. The short exclamations of the boys at having witnessed what they thought an impossibility, were the gratification I received, and the greatest, perhaps, that could be bestowed.

I once saw an instance of what may be called the grandeur of alarm in a horse. In winter, during short exercise, I was returning one evening on the back of a hunter, that was put in training for the hunter's plate. There had been some little rain, and the channel, always dry in summer, was then a small brook. As I must have rubbed his legs dry if wetted, I gave him the rein, and made him leap the brook, which he understood as a challenge for play, and beginning to gambol, after a few antics he reared very high, and, plunging forward with great force, alighted with his fore feet on the edge of a deep gravel-pit half filled with water, so near that a very few inches further he must have gone headlong down. His first astonishment and fear were so great, that he stood for some time breathless and motionless: then, gradually recollecting himself, his back became curved, his ears erect, his hind and fore leg in a position for sudden retreat; his nostrils from an inward snort burst into one loud expression of horror; and rearing on his hind legs, he turned short round, expressing all the terrors he had felt by the utmost violence of plunging, kicking, and other bodily exertions. I was not quite so much frightened as he had been, but I was heartily glad, when he became quiet again, that the accident had been no worse. The only little misfortune I had was the loss of my cap, and being obliged to ride back some way in order to recover it.

Among the disagreeable, and in some degree dangerous, accidents that happened to me, was the following. We had an old grey blood gelding touched in his wind, called Puff, on which John Watson generally used to ride. He had some vicious tricks, and the thing that made him dangerous was, that, in the jockey's phrase, he had lost his mouth, that is, the bit could make no impression on him, and he could run away with the strongest rider; but the whim did not often take him. The watering troughs were filled once a day, and as they were about a mile and a half distant, each had performed that duty in turns, being obliged to walk for that purpose to the Devil's Ditch and back. One day, when it was my turn, old Puff being in the stable, John Watson allowed me to shorten my task by a ride, of which I was very glad, and Puff was soon brought out. For the office of filling the troughs, it was necessary to take a pail, and accordingly I flung one with the rim over my right shoulder, and under my left arm, as was the way with us when we walked. I then mounted, but had not gone far, before I found Mr. Puff was determined on one of his frolics. He set off at a good round gallop. This I should not have regarded in the least, had it not been for the pail at my back. But he was a tall horse, the ruts before the race-course began were numerous, rough, and often narrow, and he amused himself with crossing them; so that the rim of the pail was very disagreeable, and now and then hurt my back severely. I foresaw, however, that my only remedy was to tire him out of his own diversion. As soon, therefore, as I had an opportunity, I turned him upon the turf, by which I avoided the worst jolts of the pail; and, instead of struggling with him, I gave him head, and hurried him forward as fast as he could go, passed along the side of the flat, turned in beside the Devil's Ditch, forbore to stop him when we came to the watering trough, but found the obstinate old devil was resolved not to stop. I then took him full gallop up Cambridge hill, and into Newmarket, supposing his own home would satisfy him. But no! away he went into the town, where some boys belonging to other stables exclaimed, "Here is old Puff running away with Watson's Tom." At a certain distance down the main street, was a street on the left, by which, making a little circle, I might again bring his head homewards, and that road I prevailed on him to take; but as he was not easily guided, he thought proper to gallop on the causeway, till he came to a post which bent inwards towards the wall, so much that it was doubtful whether his body would pass. He stopped short at a single step, but luckily I had foreseen this, or I should certainly have been pitched over his neck, and probably my back would have been broken, had I not employed both hands with all my force to counteract the shock. Having measured the distance with his eye, he saw he could pass, which to me was a new danger; my legs would one or both of them have wanted room, but with the same juvenile activity I raised them on the withers, and away again we went, mutually escaping unhurt. By this time, however, my gentleman was wearied; in two minutes we were at home, and there he thought proper once more to stop. The worst of it, however, was, that I had still to water my troughs. I shall conclude this chapter with a fact which may deserve the attention of the philosopher, as an instance of deep feeling, great sagacity, and almost unconquerable ambition among horses; and which goes nearly to prove, that they themselves understand why they contend with each other. I have mentioned a vicious horse, of the name of Forester, that would obey no boy but Tom Watson: he was about ten or eleven years old, and had been a horse of some repute, but unfortunately his feet foundered, for the cure of which he was suffered to remain a great part of his time at grass. However, when I had been about a year and a half at Newmarket, Captain Vernon thought proper to match him against Elephant, a horse belonging to Sir Jennison Shaftoe, whom, by the bye, I saw ride this famous match. Forester, therefore, had been taken up, and kept in training a sufficient time to qualify him to run this match; but it was evident that his legs and feet were far from being in that sound state which such an exertion required, so that we concluded he must be beaten, for the reputation of Elephant arose out of his power rather than his speed. Either I mistake, or the match was a four mile heat over the straight course; and the abilities of Forester were such, that he passed the flat, and ascended the hill as far as the distance post, nose to nose with Elephant; so that John Watson who rode him began to conceive hopes. Between this and the chair, Elephant, in consequence of hard whipping, got some little way before him, while Forester exerted every possible power to recover at least his lost equality; till finding all his efforts ineffectual, he made one sudden spring, and caught Elephant by the under-jaw, which he griped so violently as to hold him back; nor was it without the utmost difficulty that he could be forced to quit his hold. Poor Forester, he lost; but he lost most honourably! Every experienced groom, we were told, thought it a most extraordinary circumstance. John Watson declared he had never in his life been more surprised by the behaviour of a horse.

CHAP. XV.

THE feature in my character which was to distinguish it at a late period of life, namely, some few pretensions to literary acquirement, has appeared for a time to have lain dormant. After I left Berkshire, circumstances had been so little favourable to me, that except the mighty volume of Sacred Writ (which I always continued more or less to peruse, wherever I found a Bible) and two small remnants of romance I have mentioned, letters seemed to have lost sight of me, and I of letters. Books were not then as they fortunately are now, great or small, on this subject or that, to be found in almost every house: a book, except of prayer or of daily religious use, was scarcely to be seen but among the opulent, or in the possession of the studious; and by the opulent it were often disregarded with a degree of neglect which would now almost disgraceful. Yet in the course of six or seven years, it hardly be imagined that not a single book fell in my way; or that if it did, I should not eagerly employ such opportunity as I had to know its contents. Even the walls of cottages and little alehouses would do something; for many of them had old English ballads such as "Death and the Lady," and "Margaret's Ghost," with lamentable tragedies, or King Charles's golden rules, occasionally pinned on them. These were at that time the learning, and often the doubt, the delight of the vulgar. However, I may venture to affirm, that during the period we have passed, I neither lost my possession, nor met with any book of any kind which I did not take my leisure and permission to read through. During my residence at Newmarket, I was not quite so much in the desert, though, as my limits extended, I was little removed; a tolerable estimate of the boundary may be formed from the remaining chapter of this book.

Whether I had or had not begun to scrawl and imitate was a question whether I was able to convey written intelligence concerning me to my father for some months after I left him, I cannot say. We were very careful not to lose sight of each other; and followed with affection, as well as his love of change, in about half a year, came to Newmarket himself, where he at first procured the most ordinary kind at his trade. There was one shopmates whom I well remember, for he was struck with me, and I with him; he not only made shoes, but was a cock-feeder of some estimation; and what was to me much more interesting, he had read so much as to have made himself acquainted with the most popular English authors of that day. He even lent me books to read; among which were "Gulliver's Travels," and the "Spectator," both of which could not but be to me of the highest importance. I remember after I had read them, he asked me to consider and tell him which I liked best: I immediately replied, "There was no need of consideration; I liked 'Gulliver's Travels' ten times the best." "Aye," said he, "I would have laid my life on it; boys and young people always prefer the marvellous to the true." I acquiesced in his judgment, which, however, only proved that neither he nor I understood Gulliver, though it afforded me infinite delight. The behaviour of my father, who, being at work, was present at this, and two or three other dialogues in which there was a kind of literary pretension, denoted the pride and exultation of his heart. He remarked, "that many such boys as Tom were not to be found! It was odd enough! He knew not where Tom had picked it up, he had never had a brain for such things; but God gave some gifts to some, and others to others, seeing He was very bountiful; but, if he guessed rightly, He had given Tom his share!" My father was not a little flattered to find that the cock-feeder was inclined to concur with him in opinion. I remember little else of my literary cock-feeder; yet the advantages I had gained from him in letting me know there were books like these, and introducing me, though but to a momentary view of Swift and Addison, were perhaps incalculable.

That love of the marvellous which is natural to ill-informed man, is still more lively in childhood. I used to listen with the greatest pleasure to a tale of providential interference; my blood thrilled through my frame at a story of an angel alighting in a field, walking up to a worthy clergyman, telling him a secret known only to himself, and then persuading him to change his road, by which he avoided the murderers that were lying in wait for him. Yet I know not how it happened, but even at this time I refused to believe in witches; and when stories of hobgoblins, of houses that were haunted, or of nightly apparitions were repeated, I remained incredulous. I had either invented or heard some of the plain arguments which showed the absurdity of such opinions. It will be seen in the following chapter, that my incredulity in this respect was of use to me, though I cannot account for the manner in which I came by it at so early an age.

Books of piety, if the author were but inspired with zeal, fix my attention whenever I met with them: "The Whole Duty of Man" was my favourite study, and still more Horneck's "Crucified Jesus." I had not yet arrived at Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest," or "The Life of Francis Spira;" but John Bunyan ranked among the most divine authors I had ever read. In fact I was truly well-intentioned, but my zeal was too ardent, and liable to become dangerous.

One day as I happened to be passing the church, I heard voice singing, which exercise I admired; and having, as I thought, a tuneful voice, I was desirous of becoming acquainted with a pleasing art. I approached the church door, found it open, and went in, when I found my ear charmed with some heavenly addition to the sweet melody of music; and on inquiry was told they were singing in four parts. At the head of them was a Mr Langham, who could sing in a feigned soprano's voice, and who was their instructor in music; for they were all acknowledged learners except himself, and each of them paid him five shilling a quarter for his trouble in teaching them. Having stood with delight to listen some time, a conversation at length began; I was invited to try my voice, and after a ready compliance, both my voice and ear were pronounced to be good. Thus encouraged, I ventured to ask if I might come among them; and was answered yes; they should be very glad to have me, for they much wanted a treble voice, and all they required was that I should conform to the rules of the society. I inquired what those rules were, and was told, they each paid five shillings entrance, and five shilling a quarter to Mr. Langham, another five shillings for Arnold "Psalmody"; and that they paid forfeits of pennies and twopence if they were absent on certain days, at certain hours, or infringed other necessary bye-laws. An expense so great alarmed me: I would willingly have complied with their forfeits, because I depended on my own punctuality; but fifteen shillings was a vast sum, and I told them what it was that made me hesitate. As they were desirous to have me, they agreed that I should sing out of their books; and Langham, who had great good-nature, said, since I was but a boy, and my wages could not be great, he would give up the entrance money. It was therefore agreed, that with the payment of five shillings a quarter to Mr. Langham, I should be instructed by him in the art of psalmody.

From the little I that day learned, and from another lesson or two, I obtained a tolerable conception of striking intervals upwards or downwards; such as the third, the fourth, and the remainder of the octave, the chief feature in which I soon understood, but of course I found most difficulty in the third, sixth, and seventh. Previously however to any great progress, I was obliged to purchase Arnold's "Psalmody"; and studious over this divine treasure, I passed many a forenoon extended in the hay-loft. My chief, and almost my only, difficulty, lay in the impenetrable obscurity of such technical words as were not explained either by their own nature, or by the author in other language. I was illiterate; I knew the language of the vulgar well, but little more. Perhaps no words ever puzzled poor mortal more than I was puzzled by the words, major and minor keys. I think it a duty, which no one who writes an elementary book ought to neglect, to give a vocabulary of all the words which are not in common use, in the language in which he writes; and to explain them by the simplest terms in that language; or if that cannot be done, by a clear and easy paraphrase. The hours I spent by myself in mastering whatever belonged to notation, and in learning the intervals, occasioned my progress to be so very different from that of the others, that it excited the admiration of them all; and Mr. Langham, the great man whom I then looked up to, declared it was surprising. If any part was out, I heard it immediately, and often struck the note for them, getting the start of Mr. Langham. If he should happen to be absent, he said that I could set them all right; so that by this, and the clearness of my voice, I obtained the nickname of the sweet singer of Israel.

My quickness at whatever related to reading became so far known, that a man about fifty, who had many years kept a school in Newmarket, made me the offer, if I would become his scholar, to teach me gratis. Thoroughly glad of the opportunity, I thanked him kindly, and instantly complied. The next morning I went to his school, where I saw a number of boys, to whom I was introduced by the master, as one whom they ought to respect. "I'll set him a word of six syllables," said he, "and I'll engage for him that he shall spell it instantly without the least mistake, or without ever perhaps having seen it before. Pray, my boy," said he, "do you spell Mahershalalashbas?" The boys first stared at a word of so foreign a sound, and next at the immediate readiness with which I spelled it, though it would be difficult to find a word that could puzzle less: however, since they all wondered at me, it was very natural I should wonder at myself, and that I did most assuredly. The master showed me the first seat as an honour to school, where he assured me I might remain as long as he could teach me any thing, and he had by no means the character of ignorance. But, poor gentleman, he had another failing, which could still less pardon; for every afternoon he was to be seen drunk in the streets, and that to such an offensive and shameful degree, that though I was very desirous to gain some little addition to my stock of knowledge, I felt myself so disgraced by my master that I went but three times to his school.

This plan, however, suggested another. By trade, Mr. Langhorne was a maker of leather breeches, which were worn through Newmarket: but he had by some means acquired rather a great love of knowledge, and more of it than at that period belonged to his station; for I believe he was only a journeyman. Hearing how I bewail the opportunity I had lost, and especially that of acquiring the first rudiments of arithmetic, he joined in my regret, saying it was a pity he could not afford to teach me himself for nothing, and that I could not spare another five shillings a quarter out of my wages; otherwise he would have given me one lesson daily between stable-hours. To this proposal, after turning it in my mind, I however agreed. I continued with him three months, and in that time mastered rule after rule so well, as to understand Practice and the Rule of Three. Except what I have already related, these three months, as far as others were concerned, may be truly called my course of education. At the age of two and three and thirty, indeed, when I was endeavouring to acquire the French language, I paid a Monsieur Raymont twenty shillings for a few lessons, but the good he did me was so little that it was money thrown away. At Newmarket I was intent on studying arithmetic, that, for want of better apparatus, I have often got an old nail, and cast up sums on the paling of the stable-yard. The boys prophesied I should go mad; in which sagacious conjecture our old maid and housekeeper, for she and both, joined them.

CHAP. XVI.

WHILE my music and my arithmetic were thus in some sort confusing my brain, I became not only ashamed of, but alarmed at myself; for being occasionally sent on errands, I found my memory absent, and made several blunders, a thing to which I had been wholly unaccustomed. One day, when John Watson was at home, I was sent only for two things, and forgot one of them, at which I heard him exclaim, without any reproach,—“ God bless me, what is come to the boy ! ” This startled me a little. As, however, I remember nothing more of the paroxysm, it could not have lasted very long.

My father did not continue long at his trade, and was obliged to seek some other mode of subsistence. For some months, during the middle part of the time that I remained as a stable-boy, he had the office at an inn of fetching and carrying the Royston mail; and being afterwards tired of this, he quitted Newmarket for London, leaving me once more with much good advice, and no small degree of regret. I loved my father, and knew his intentions were honest; but almost from infancy, I was aware they were not wise.

I suppose that that property of the mind, which creates certain indistinct forms and imaginary lines in the clear and visible appearances of things, is common to every person of a lively and active fancy, for I have it still; and now that I am old, much more in sickness than in health. I recollect an instance of this, which occurred about the time I am speaking of. The cowardly boys made bargains with each other to go in pairs, when their business called them to different parts of the yard and out-houses after it was dark: I determined always to go by myself. One evening, intending to fetch some hay from a hay-loft, as I was mounting the ladder, an object presented itself, that instantly stopped me. It was a clear moon-light night, and I beheld the perfect face of a man extended on the hay. He must be a stranger, and might be a robber, or person of evil intentions. I had no idea of a ghost; and though alarmed, I reasoned on probabilities. The more I looked, the more thoroughly I was convinced I saw a real face. Still I continued to reason. I was half way up the ladder. If I returned, I must either fabricate a falsehood, or openly declare why, and this would have been cause of triumph to those w actions betrayed their fears, and of the greater disgrace to m having assumed a superiority. The man might be a beggar, had only obtained entrance by some means, that he might comfortably : and, even if his designs were wicked, they could be against me, for I had little to lose : so that at last I determ to proceed. As I have said, the light of the moon was bright shone into the loft through the holes and crevices of a side han door ; and I had mounted three steps higher, before the v totally disappeared, and was replaced by the rude and unmea lines of reality. No man was there, consequently no man's could be seen. This incident was a wholesome lesson : it ta me to think much on the facility with which the senses are ceived, and the folly with which they entertain fear.

The boys who had paired off as mutual protectors to each o had left my namesake Tom, being the odd one, without a n and, as he was much more remarkable for his cowardice than valour, the best expedient he could think of, was to offer r halfpenny a night if I would go with him in the dark to get his . I believe nothing could have made him stir from the fireside . winter night, but the fear of neglecting his stable duties ; w fear to all of us had something in it that was almost sacred. had at this time in the stables a very beautiful male tabby as remarkable for his familiarity with the horses and boys, a his fine colours, symmetry, and strength. He would go thr the stable night by night, and place himself on the withers, fir this horse, then of the next, and there familiarly take his sleep he had made the whole round. The boys had taught him sev tricks, which he very willingly repeated as often as they gave signal, without taking offence at the rogueries they occasio practised upon him ; so that he was a general favourite with e one, from John Watson, even to old Betty. One evening, as I going with Tom to get his hay, and we approached the stabl which it happened then to be kept, Tom leading the road cowards are always desirous to convince themselves they are r valiant), a very sudden, vehement, and discordant noise was he to listen to which, Tom's valour was wholly unequal. Flying t the stable, he was at the back-door of the house in a twinkling was paid for my courage : pride and curiosity concurred to s me show it, and I remained firm at my post. I stood still, v

the noise at intervals was several times repeated. It was the beginning of winter, and at one end of the stable a certain quantity of autumn wheat was stowed. I recollected this circumstance; and after considering some time, at length the truth struck me, and I called, "Come along, Tom, it is the cat and the rats fighting; but they will leave off when they hear us come into the stable." We had neither candle nor lanthorn. It was a maxim with John Watson to trust no such things with boys, whose nightly duty it was to fetch trusses of straw and armfuls of hay; but I entered the stable, gave Tom his hay, loaded myself with my own, and confident in the valour of our favourite cat, said to him — "We shall find a rare number of dead rats to-morrow, Tom." I knew not the power of numbers, nor the imbecility of an individual so exposed. The next morning we found our hero lying dead in the stable, with only three dead rats beside him. What the number of the wounded was, must remain a secret to posterity: though of the value of this and other secrets of the same kind, I have often entertained my doubts.

John Watson remained a bachelor, and old Betty was the only female, at least that I can recollect, in the family: she was very ignorant, and very angry when boys durst contend with her age and experience; but we did not greatly respect her anger. She was so strenuous an advocate for goblins, apparitions, and especially witchcraft, that she did not in the least scruple to affirm things the most extravagant. One of her positions was, that unthinking old women with less courage and sagacity than herself, were taken by surprise, and made witches against their will. Imps of the devil came slyly upon them, ran up their clothes, caught some part of the breast in their mouths, and made a teat for themselves. She provoked me very much, yet I could not help laughing; while she, to prove the truth of what she said, affirmed she had seen them peeping out more than once; and that on a certain night two of them made a desperate attempt on her, which she could no otherwise defeat, than by taking up first one, and then the other, with the tongs, and throwing them both into the red hot part of the kitchen fire.

Stories like these are almost too ludicrous to be mentioned, but the one I am going to relate was at that time to me as tragical as anything that could happen to an individual.

Jack Clarke, now about eighteen, was spending his evening before nine o'clock in his good-natured way among the Lord March, who lived opposite. One of them (I forget his name) took down a fowling-piece that was hanging over the chimney, and playing that trick which has been so repeated in my opinion so strangely played, said, "Now, Jack, I'll try you." As he spoke, he pulled the trigger, and the distance between them being short, Clarke was shot on the left side of the face, the middle half of which immediately became as frightful a wound as perhaps was ever beheld. The lads of both stables there instantly: the grooms came the moment they could be and the terror and distress of the scene were very great, for everybody felt kindness for Jack Clarke. Tom Watson was despatched on horseback to Cambridge in search of all the surgical and medical aid that could be obtained; and such was his speed, that the surgeon, the doctor, and himself, were back by midnight, and the medical men busy in probing, inquiring, and consulting. The poor Clarke lay groaning, extended on the bed of John Vane. The left cheek-bone, eye, and other parts, were shattered. All hope: the case was thought precarious, there was a bare possibility that the patient, miserable as he was, and shocking to look upon, might survive. When the physician and surgeon had done what they could by dressing and giving orders, John Watson took them under his care for the night. Whether he found any entertainment for them at an inn, or at the house of a friend, I know not; but as I saw him no more, I suppose he remained with them to keep them company, for such scenes do not immediately dispose the mind to sleep. Among ourselves at home, how very serious a question arose, no less than that of who should stay up and watch with him all night? His sufferings were so constant, his groans so terrifying, and the wounds (by which the left side of the head was made visible) had been so bloody, raw, and torn, being at the same time most frightfully spread all round with gunpowder, and black and red spots, that every person I saw frankly owned they durst not stay alone all night with him in the same chamber. When it was proposed to old Betty, she refused, it was an agony. All the older boys expressed the terror it would be to them:—some sleep must be had, and it being winter, the windows were to open before four. What, therefore, could be done?

I was almost like the rest, but I most truly pitied poor Clarke. I had always felt a kindness for him, and to see him forsaken at so distressing a moment, left by himself in wretched state, no one able to foresee what he might want, overcame me, and I said, "Well, since nobody else will, I must!" Besides, by an action so bold, performed by a boy at my age, I gained an undeniable superiority, of which any one of the elder boys would have been proud. The medical men remained at Newmarket, or went and came as their business required, while Jack Clarke continued under their hands. I was truly anxious for his cure, though from what I had seen on the first night, and from my ignorance in surgery, I had supposed such a thing impossible. I was therefore surprised that he should seem at first to linger on, that afterwards the wounds should fill up, and assume a less frightful appearance, and that at length a perfect cure should be effected. It was certainly thought to do great honour to Cambridge. The left eye was lost, the appearance of the bones was disfigured, and the deep stain of the gunpowder remained. But before I came away appearances varied, the marks of the gunpowder became less; and when I left Newmarket, Jack Clarke had been long restored to the stables, where he continued to live, apparently in good health.

CHAP. XVII.

DURING these events and accidents, the trifling studies I might be said to have, were, as far as I had the means, pursued. That is, whenever I could procure a book, I did not fail to read it; I took pains to repeat, that I might well understand my rules in arithmetic; and as for music, Arnold was studied with increasing ardour. But the instructions of Arnold were only vocal: nay, they had a stricter limitation, they were confined to psalmody. Had I possessed any instrument, had I begun to practise, and had the means of obtaining a livelihood suggested themselves in this way, music would, most probably, have been my profession.

Moral remarks do not escape the notice of boys whose minds are active, nor the moral consequences of things, so much, perhaps, as is supposed. They now and then discover how much they are themselves affected by them; and therefore are not only led to re-consider their own, but begin to ruminate on some of the practices of mankind. For myself, I looked up with delight to angelic purity, and with awful reverence to the sublime attributes of the Godhead. The first I considered as scarcely beyond the attainment of man; the second I considered it as the grand reward of saints and angels to be allowed to comprehend. Towards the future attainment of any such angelic perfection, I could not discover the least tendency in the manners of Newmarket, or the practices of the people around me. When left to themselves, petty vulgar vices, such as their means could afford, were common among them; and at the grand periodical meetings of the place, I heard of nothing but cards, dice, cock-fighting, and gambling to an enormous amount.

One anecdote which John Watson, who was no babbler, told his brother Tom, and which Tom was eager enough to repeat, struck me for its singularity and grandeur, as it appeared to me, who then knew nothing of vast money speculations, and who know but little at present. In addition to matches, plates, and other modes of adventure, that of a sweepstakes had come into vogue; and the opportunity it gave to deep calculators to secure themselves from loss by hedging their bets, greatly multiplied the bettors, and gave uncommon animation to the sweepstakes mode. In one of these, Captain Vernon had entered a colt or filly, and as the prize to be obtained was great, the whole stable was on the alert. It was prophesied that the race would be a severe one; for, though the horses had none of them run before, they were all of the highest breed, that is, their sires and dams were in the first lists of fame. As was foreseen, the contest was indeed a severe one, for it could not be decided, — it was a dead heat: but our colt was by no means among the first. Yet so adroit was Captain Vernon in hedging his bets, that if one of the two colts that made it a dead heat had beaten, our master would, on that occasion, have won ten thousand pounds; as it was, he lost nothing, nor would in any case have lost any thing. In the language of the turf, he stood ten thousand pounds to nothing.

A fact, so extraordinary to ignorance, and so splendid to poverty, could not pass through a mind like mine without making a strong impression, which the tales told by the boys of the sudden rise of gamblers, their reverses, desperate fortunes, empty pockets at night, and hats full of guineas in the morning, only tended to increase.

With my companions I repeated, Never venture, never win: and in this state of puerile avarice, I made bets to the amount of more than half my year's wages, the very next day, on the race ground, all to be decided within the week. Concerning the event, however, when it was too late, my mind began to misgive me. By each match, on which I had a venture, my fears were increased; for I generally found myself on the wrong side. My crowns and half-crowns were dwindling away; yet in the midst of my despair, I looked with some degree of surprise at myself, and said, "How can these boys, with whom I betted, who are so very ignorant, and over whom, even on the turf or in the stable, I feel my own superiority, have so much more cunning in laying bets than I have?"

Like many of the tragical farces of life, this hastily-formed scheme of mine was without a basis, formed on confused suppositions, and ending in total disappointment; for at the end of the week, the loss I had sustained was somewhat either over or under a guinea and a half. To me, who never before had ventured to bet sixpence, who now well remembered that all the good books I had read held gambling in abhorrence; and who recollected, with unspeakable anguish, that the sin and folly must be told to my father; that, face to face, I must avow what I had done (for how else could I account for the expenditure of money, for which I could find no equivalent?) to me, I say, these were excruciating thoughts, as will be proved by the desperate remedy I attempted. Well was it for me that the races were over, or my little purse would have been wholly emptied. As it was not therefore possible for me to recover my loss in this way, I began to consider whether there was no other, and despair at length suggested another; a wild one, it is true, but no one could deny its possibility. The race week was just over; thousands of pounds had been betted; guineas and purses had passed in multitudes from hand to hand, and pocket to pocket, over a vast area, extending from the chair to the Devil's Ditch, and spreading to I know not what width: might not some stray guinea, nay, perhaps some weighty purse, be now lying there for the first fortunate comer? Or rather, was it not a thing exceedingly likely? I could not suppose the seeds of this golden fruit to be sown exceedingly thick, or that it would not require a long search; but I must not spare my labour: such good luck might befall me, and so eager was my mind to rid itself of its present anguish, that I was willing to believe I should be successful.

The next morning the horses were no sooner dressed and fed, and the stables cleaned, than I hurried to execute my design. I began it by a most careful examination of the betting chair, round which I slowly walked a number of times, and finding nothing below, mounted, examined its crevices, and after often attempting to go, and as often lingering by some faint endeavour to renew hope could not quit it at last, but with painful reluctance. Where should I seek next? The whole heath was before me; but which was the lucky spot? Groups of horsemen had assembled here and there: but to find each individual place? Oh that I had marks by which to discover! — Thus with my eyes fixed on the ground wandering eagerly in every direction, I slowly paced the ground wholly intent on the perplexing thoughts and fruitless pursuit till increasing disappointment, and inquiry into the time of day sent me back. This experiment of money-finding on Newmarket heath might be thought sufficient, but, no! I had an hour in the evening: it was a fine moonlight night, and dejected as I was, resolved again to try, and forth I went, but it was indeed on the forlorn hope. The incident however forcibly paints the nature of my feelings. I could not endure to confess to my father both my guilt, and evident inferiority in cunning to other boys; and to fabricate a lie was perhaps equally painful. All that remained was to put off the evil day, and come to my account as late as might be. What I mean will be better understood, when it is known I had determined to leave Newmarket, and return to my father, not however without having first consulted him, and gained his approbation. My mind having its own somewhat peculiar bias, circumstances had rather occurred to disgust me, than to invite me to stay. I despised my companions for the grossness of their ideas and the total absence of every pursuit in which the mind appeared to have any share. It was even with sneers of contempt that they saw me intent on acquiring some small portion of knowledge: so that I was far from having any prompter, either as a friend or rival. As far as I was concerned with horses, I was pleased; but I saw scarcely a biped, John Watson excepted, in whom I could find any thing to admire.

Having taken my resolution, I had to summon up my courage to give John Watson warning; not that I in the least suspected he would say any thing more than, very well: but he had been a kind master, had relieved me in the day of my distress, had never imputed faults to me of which I was not guilty, had fairly waited to give my faculties time to show themselves, and had rewarded them with no common degree of praise when accident brought them to light. It was therefore painful to leave such a master. With respect off, and unusual awkwardness in my manner, I went up to him, and he perceiving I was embarrassed, yet had something say, began thus: "Well, Tom, what is the matter now?" "Oh, sir, nothing much is the matter; only I had just a word to say." "Well, well, don't stand about it; let me hear." "Nay, sir, it is a trifle; I only came to tell you, I think of going to London." "To London?" "Yes, sir, if you please." "When do you mean to go to London?" "When my year is up, sir." "To London! What the plague has put that whim into your head?" "I believe you know my father is in London." "Well, what of that?" "We have written together, so it is resolved on." "Have you got a place?" "I don't want one, sir, I could not have a better than I have." "And what are you to do?" "I can't tell that yet, but I think of being a shoemaker." "Pshaw, you are a blockhead, and your father is a foolish man." "He loves me very dearly, sir; and I love and honour him." "Yes, yes, I believe you are a good boy; but I tell you, you are both doing a very foolish thing. Stay at Newmarket, and I will be bound for it you will make your fortune." "I would rather go back to my father, sir, if you please." "Nay, then, pray take your own way." So saying, he turned from me with very visible chagrin, at which I felt some surprise; for I did not imagine it would give him the least concern should any one lad in the stables quit his service.

Spring and summer kept passing away: Arnold continued to afford me difficulties which I continued to overcome: my good-tempered, pleasant friend (for so he was), the breeches maker, and I, used often to consult together; and his surprise that I should so soon have gone beyond him with respect to the theory of music, not a little flattered me. The honest psalm singers were told I was about to leave them, and owned they were sorry to hear it, I gave them so much assistance. In short, such friends as a poor boy of fifteen, wholly unrelated in the town, could have, all expressed a degree of regret at parting: my stable companions were the only persons who expressed no emotion one way or the other. I must here, however, except poor Jack Clarke, who, as he was the first that introduced me to Newmarket, so he was the last of whom I took leave.

END OF MR. HOLCROFT'S NARRATIVE.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

AT the expiration of his year, Mr. Holcroft left John Watts and his associates at Newmarket; and returned, as he had intended, to his father, who then kept a cobbler's stall in South Audley Street. He was at this time near sixteen. He continued to work at the stall with his father, till the latter could afford to pay a journeyman shoemaker to instruct him in the business of making shoes, which in time he learned so well, as to obtain the best wages.

From his early childhood, however, he had eagerly read whatever books came in his way, and this habit did not now leave so that, though an exceedingly quick workman, it was rare that he had a shilling to spare, except for absolute necessities when he had, it was spent at an old book-stall, and his time again idled away in reading.—Such was the complaint constantly made against him. At nineteen, he travelled to Liverpool to see his father, who seems still to have retained his love of wandering, and who was most probably determined in this excursion to revisit his native country. This happened in the year 1764; and in the year following, Mr. Holcroft married. When he continued at Liverpool, he procured the humble office of teacher to children to read, at a small school in the town. But in less than a year, he left the country, and came to London. Here he continued to work at his trade as a shoemaker, yet gleaned knowledge from all the industry in his power. He had advanced as far as first in arithmetic, knew something of geometry, could write a good hand, and had made himself a complete master of vocal music. But the stooping position required in making shoes brought a return of his old disorder, the asthma; and as he hated the idea of he made every effort to find out some other employment.

Mr. Holcroft had, through life, except during the time he spent at Newmarket, felt the effects of poverty very severely; but now preyed more upon his mind than his body. He continued to ruminate on the advantages that would have resulted from a good education; and the consciousness that he had neither received one, nor could now pay for instruction, gave him the business. He was not aware that the desultory materials which had been at so much pains to collect, would at last form themselves into a consistent mass.

It seems, however, that at this period he could not resist the inclination he occasionally felt to commit his thoughts to paper: he found an editor of a newspaper (the "Whitehall Evening Post"), who so far approved of his essays, as to pay him five guineas a column for them. One of them was transcribed into the "Annual Register:" but, according to his own account, it was rather too jejune a performance to deserve any such honour. At this time, Mr. Holcroft attempted to set up a day-school in the country, where for three months he lived upon omelettes and buttermilk, and had but one scholar. At the expiration of the first quarter, he gave up his school, and returned to London. Here he obtained admission into the family of Mr. Granville Leveson, with whom he went to reside, partly in the character of a tutor, and partly, I believe, as a secretary. It is not certain whether he was introduced to the notice of this amiable but eccentric man by his literary efforts, or by accident. Both before and after he went to live with Mr. S. he had been accustomed to attend the dining-room, or spouting-club, the members of which, in turn, furnished scenes and passages out of plays. His master did not consider this the best mode of spending his time, and made some attempts to cure him of what he considered as an idle habit. These, however, proved ineffectual, and he was at length dismissed from the house of his patron.

He now found himself once more in the streets of London, without money, without a friend that shame or pride would suffer to disclose his wants to, or a habitation of any kind to hide himself in. At last, as he was wandering along wherever his feet led him, his eye accidentally glanced on a printed paper pasted on the wall. This was an invitation to all those spirited fellows who chose to make their fortunes as common soldiers in the service of the East India Company. He read it with the greatest satisfaction, and was posting away with all haste to enrol his name in that honourable corps, when he was met by one of the persons whom he had known at the spouting-club. His companion, seeing his bundle and rueful face, asked him where he was going; to which Holcroft replied, that, had he inquired five minutes sooner, he could not have told him; but that, at present, he was for the wars. At this his spouting friend appeared surprised, and told him he thought he could put him up a scheme. He said, one Macklin, a famous London actor over to play in Dublin; that he had been inquiring of a young fellow who had a turn for the stage; and that, pleased, he would introduce him, observing that it was enough to carry the knapsack if the sock did not succeed. The proposal was too agreeable to our adventurer to be heeded. Accordingly, having thanked his acquaintance, he accepted his offer, the next day was fixed upon for his interview with Macklin. The friend, on whom Holcroft had thus relied, was, in fact, a kind of scout, employed by the theatre to pick up young adventurers of promising talents: it is this actor's passions to make actors of others, though some respects, the worst qualified for the office of any world.

The next morning they proceeded to the place of a meeting, when they found the great man seated on his couch, by the fire, and on which, whenever he felt himself drowsy, he went to rest, both day and night, so that he was not in bed for a fortnight together. As they were followed by his wife, who brought him a basin of some toast, with each of which he found fifty faults in manner. He afterwards called to her several times, upon frivolous occasions, when she was dignified with the title of Bess. His countenance, as it appeared to Mr. Holcroft, was the most forbidding he had ever beheld, which had deprived him of his teeth, had not added to his face. After desiring the young candidate to sit down, he eyed him narrowly for some time, and then asked him, What had his head to turn actor? The abruptness of the question startled him, and it was some time before he could answer in a confused manner, that he had taken it into his head it was genius, but that it was very possible he might be mistaken. "Yes," said he, "that's possible enough; and, by George, I am not the first that I have known so mistaken." Holcroft, at his satire, and the other grinned ghastly with his lips, for our tyro had not added to the beauty of his visage by his words. While Macklin was drinking his tea, on indifferent subjects; and as Holcroft did not hapwith him, but, on the contrary, had opportunities of saying several things which confirmed his opinions, he was pleased to allow that he had the appearance of an ingenious young man. When his beverage was finished, he desired him to speak a speech out of some play, which being done, he remarked that he had never in his life heard a young spouter speak naturally, and therefore he was not surprised that Holcroft did not; but, as he seemed tractable, and willing to learn, if he would call again on the morrow, he would hear and answer him further.

When they had descended into the street, Holcroft's companion assured him it would do, for that he had met with a very favourable reception, — which was indeed the case, considering the character of the person to whom their visit had been paid.

According to the account Mr. Holcroft has left of this extraordinary man, the author of the comedy of "The Man of the World," he was born in the century before the last; yet at the time of Mr. Holcroft's application to him (which was in the year 1770), his faculties did not seem in the least impaired. He was said to have been bred in the interior parts of Ireland, and in such utter ignorance, as not to be able to read at the age of forty. The progress, therefore, which he made afterwards was an astonishing proof of his genius and industry. His body, like his mind, was cast in a mould as rough as it was durable. His aspect and address confounded his inferiors, and the delight he took in making others fear and admire him, gave him an aversion to the society of those whose knowledge exceeded his own; nor was he ever heard to acknowledge superiority in any man. He had no respect for the modesty of youth or sex, but would say the most discouraging, as well as grossest things, and felt pleasure in proportion to the pain he gave. It was common with him to ask his pupils why they did not rather think of becoming bricklayers than players. He was impatient of contradiction to an extreme, and when he found fault, if the person attempted to answer, he stopped him without hearing, by saying, "Ha, you have always a reason for being in the wrong!" This impatience carried him still farther, — it often rendered him exceedingly abusive. He could pronounce the words, scoundrel, fool, blockhead, familiarly, without the least annoyance to his nervous system. He, indeed, pretended to the strictest impartiality, and, while his passions were concerned, often preserved it; but these were so extremely irritable, that the least opposition was construed into an unpardonable insult, and the want of immediate apprehension in his pupils subjected them to the most galling contempt, which excited despair instead of emulation. His authority was too severe a climate for the tender plant of genius ever to thrive in. His judgment was however, in general, sound, and his instructions those of a master. "In short," says Mr. H., "if I may estimate the sensations of others by my own, those despots who, as we are told, shoot their attendants for their diversion, are not regarded with more avarice than Macklin was by his pupils and domestics." Such is the conclusion of his severe, but apparently faithful portrait of this singular character, and it will be seen in the sequel that he had sufficient opportunity for rendering it accurate.

Having finished their visit, Holcroft and his friend adjourned to the Black Lion, in Russell Street, which was at that time a place of resort for theatrical people. He here learnt that Mr. Foote was going to take a company to Edinburgh, after the close of the summer season. Being now anxious to secure himself an engagement, and the manner of Macklin having neither prejudiced him much in his favour nor given him any certain hopes of success, he resolved to apply to Mr. Foote. Accordingly, making so slight excuse to his companion, he hastened into Suffolk Street.

He had the good fortune to find the manager at breakfast with a young man, whom he employed partly on the stage, and partly as an amanuensis. "Well," said he, "young gentleman, I guess your business by the sheepishness of your manner; you have got the theatrical cacoethes, you have rubbed your shoulder against the scene: hey, is it not so?" Holcroft answered that it was. "Well, and what great hero should you wish to personate Hamlet, or Richard, or Othello, or who?" Holcroft replied that he distrusted his capacity for performing any that he had mentioned. "Indeed," said he, "that's a wonderful sign of grace. You have been teased for these many years by all the spouters in London, of which honourable fraternity I dare say you are a member for I can perceive no stage varnish, none of your true strolch-brass lacker on your face." "No indeed, sir." "I thought Well, sir, I never saw a spouter before, that did not want to surprise the town in Pierre, or Lothario, or some character that commands all the address and every requisite of a master in the art. But, come, give us a touch of your quality; a speech: here's youngster," pointing to his secretary, "will roar Jaffier against Pierre, let the loudest take both." Accordingly, he held the book, and at it they fell: the scene they chose, was that of the before mentioned characters in "Venice Preserved." For a little while after they began, it seems that Holcroft took the hint Foote had thrown out and restrained his wrath; but this appeared so insipid, and the ideas of rant and excellence were so strongly connected in his mind, than when Jaffier began to exalt his voice, he could no longer contain himself; but, as Nic. Bottom says, they both roared so, that it would have done your heart good to hear them. Foote smiled, and after enduring this vigorous attack upon his organs of hearing as long as he was able, interrupted them.

Far from discouraging our new beginner, he told him that, with respect to giving the meaning of the words, he spoke much more correctly than he had expected. "But," said he, "like other novices, you seem to imagine that all excellence lies in the lungs: whereas, such violent exertions should be used but very sparingly, and upon extraordinary occasions; for (besides that these two gentlemen, instead of straining their throats, are supposed to be in common conversation) if an actor make no reserve of his powers, how is he to rise according to the tone of the passion?" He then read the scene they had rehearsed, and with so much propriety and ease, as well as force, that Holcroft was surprised, having hitherto supposed the risible faculties to be the only ones over which he had any great power.

Mr. Holcroft afterwards displayed his musical talents, which also met with the approbation of Foote; who, however, told him, that as he was entirely inexperienced with respect to the stage, if he engaged him, his salary, at first, would be very low. He said it was impossible to judge with certainty of stage requisites till they had been proved; and that if, upon consideration, he thought it expedient to accept of one pound per week, he might come to him again a day or two before the theatre in the Haymarket shut up; but that if he could meet with a more flattering offer in the mean time, he begged he might be no obstacle.

Mr. Holcroft came away from this celebrated wit, delighted with the ease and frankness of his behaviour, and elated with his prospect of success. But as he had promised Macklin to call again, he did not think it right to fail in his engagement. Accordingly, on his second visit, he gave him a part to read in a piece of which he himself was the author, and which had met with great success. Having finished this task, apparently to the satisfaction of the author, the latter paid his visitor so high a compliment, as to show him some scenes of a comedy which he was then writing. They were characteristic and satirical, and met with Holcroft's sincere and hearty approbation, which, it may be supposed, did a little contribute to prejudice Macklin in his favour. He, however, thought himself bound not to act with duplicity; and therefore told Macklin of the offer he had had from Foot, excusing this second application from the necessity he was under of getting immediate employment. Macklin allowed the force of the excuse, but thought he might do better in Ireland. He inquired if Holcroft had any objection to become a prompter, adding that the office was profitable, and one for which, from the good he wrote, and other circumstances, he might easily qualify himself. Holcroft answered, that Macklin was the best judge of his own strength for the office, and that he had no objection to the situation, except that it would be more agreeable to his inclination to become an actor. This inclination the other said might be indulged at the same time, which would render him so much the more useful. Little parts would frequently be wanting; the going on for a long time would accustom him to face the audience, and tread the stage, which would be an advantage. Holcroft then demanded what salary he would be annexed to this office; and received for answer, that there was a good deal of trouble in it, he could not have less than thirty shillings a week, especially if he undertook to perform the parts occasionally. Macklin also informed him, that he was not a manager himself, he only went as a performer; but that one of the managers was in town, to whom he would speak, and in two or three days return him a positive answer. In the interim he desired his protegé to call in the morning, and he would give him instructions in the part he had read to him, for he had some thoughts of letting him play it. After making proper acknowledgments for these favours, our young adventurer took his leave much better pleased than at his first visit.

CHAP. II.

It was not long before every thing was settled in the manner proposed by Macklin, and Mr. Holcroft was informed that it was necessary for him to set off for Dublin, it being the intention of the proprietors to open the theatre about the beginning of October. In consequence of the desire he had expressed to appear in some character, Macklin had promised not only to procure him such an opportunity, but likewise to instruct and become his patron : and Holcroft's representing to him his want of cash for the journey, lent him six guineas on the part of the managers, and gave him a letter to one of them, who would, he said, provide him with a lodging, and do him other trifling services, which would be agreeable to a person in his situation.

Holcroft now rewarded his spouting friend with a guinea, redeemed his clothes, which he had been forced to pawn, and left London, elated with the most flattering hopes. He arrived in Dublin about the latter end of September, 1770. The novelty of the scene, and the vast difference in the economy and manners of the people, made a strong impression on his imagination. The wharf at the mouth of the Liffy renders the entrance up that river passable only to ships of small burthen, and to them only when the tide serves. It was low water when the packet arrived at the mouth of the river, and a boat came alongside of the vessel, into which most of the passengers went, rather than wait another tide, and our adventurer among the rest. The river divides the city, and the other passengers were set on shore on the quay : but Holcroft, as directed by his letter, inquired for Capel Street, which was on the opposite side. Thither, accordingly, he was carried ; and his trunk and himself landed in a beer-house. He was rather astonished when the watermen demanded five and fivepence, together with a quart of threepenny, for his conveyance from the packet ; and the more so, as he had seen the other passengers give out a shilling each, and one or two of the meaner among them only sixpence. He remonstrated against the imposition, and noted the precedent of the shilling ; but in vain.

The disorder of their looks, the smoothness of their tongues, and the possession they had taken of his trunk, on which one of them

seated himself, while the other argued the case, induced our nov- to comply with their demands: but what gave him the great astonishment was, that the landlord of the beer-house, who sworn stoutly to their honesty while he was paying them, sooner saw their backs turned, than, according to his own phraseology, "he pitched them to the divel, for a couple of cut-thro- chating rascals, that desarved hanging worse than a murderer."

The reflections to which this and similar scenes gave rise in Mr Holcroft's mind, though trite, are not the less worthy of attention. He says, "During my short stay in Ireland, I had but too many occasions to observe a shocking depravity of manners, which I attribute either to the laws, or the want of a due enforcement of them. The Irish are habitually, not naturally, licentious. They have all that warmth and generosity which are the characteristics of the best dispositions; and when properly educated, are an honour to mankind. Ireland has produced many first-rate geniuses; and in my opinion, nothing but the foregoing circumstance has prevented her from producing many more. It is the legislature which forms the manners of a nation."

When our traveller set out from London, he was assured that the house would open in the beginning of October, but it was November before the season commenced; so that his finances were once more exhausted, and he was obliged to apply to the friend to whom Macklin had recommended him, for a further supply. The acting manager was a busy, bustling fellow, void of all civility, who pretended to carry the world before him.

Mr. Holcroft soon discovered that there was an insurmountable antipathy between this man's disposition and his own. But the means of his subsistence were at stake; he endeavoured, therefore, to accommodate himself to the other's temper as much as possible, and waited for the arrival of Macklin with the utmost impatience. He understood that his engagement had been permanently fixed at thirty shillings a week: but, when he went to the treasury, he found it reduced to a guinea; and, whenever he pleaded his engagement, received the most mortifying and insulting answers. He discovered the entire improbability of his becoming a favourite. None were such but those who could administer the grossest flattery, and who industriously listened to whatever was said in the theatre concerning this petty despot and his management, in order to repeat it in the ear of their employer.

oft had vainly imagined that the presence of Macklin would and to all his grievances: he looked up to him as his patron, who had been the occasion of his leaving England, who had himself to be his friend, and was bound to protect him.
 r D—— had prejudiced him against Holcroft, or whether himself was aware of his deficiency in the honied arts of n, he could not determine; but he found him very cold in rest, and far more disposed to browbeat than countenance le had, as we have seen, promised to teach him a part, and m out in it; but when he ventured to remind him of it, he only sarcastic remarks on his incapacity. Holcroft, howrsisted in asserting the positiveness of his agreement with to his salary, concerning which Macklin had the meanness ocate; but he succeeded in obtaining an addition of four s a week.

le to extricate himself, he endured the insults of malice orance for five months, till the money which he had bor-ad been deducted from his stipend, and then D—— im-ly discharged him. It would be no easy task to describe e must have felt at this moment: he was not possessed illings in the world, was in a strange country, and had no now that he was shut out from the theatre, of obtaining a od. He saw nothing but misery and famine before him, and ed the bitterest exclamations against Macklin for the per-ess of his conduct. This he felt so strongly, that though by the severity of his manner had gained an almost entire ncy over him, he went to his house, and with the utmost s, after observing that he would rather starve than incur ther obligations to him, displayed the impropriety and inof his conduct in such animated terms, that all his wonted ss fled, and the cynic stood abashed before the boy.

e was another theatre open in Smock Alley, under the di-of Mossop; but he was insolvent, and none of his people aid. Here, however, as a last resource, Holcroft applied, s engaged at the same nominal salary that he had in Capel on appeared that there was no probability of his being paid performance at Mossop's theatre: he was therefore forced Dublin, and went on board the packet for Parkgate, in 1771.

The wind was fair till they had lost sight of the hill of Howland, but soon after sunset a hurricane came on, which in this narrow rocky sea put their lives in imminent danger. Of this, however, from the violent effects of the sea-sickness, Holcroft was insensible. They were driven during the storm considerably to the northward, and such was the ignorance of the master, and his two or three superannuated mariners, that he still continued sailing to the northward, having no knowledge of navigation but what he had gained by coasting between the two kingdoms. He was, therefore, on the present occasion quite at a loss; so that, in all probability they might have made a voyage to Greenland, had not an intelligent Scotchman among the passengers known some of the islands in his own country. The master would have contested the point, but that the passengers perceived his want of skill, joined the North Briton, who, with a degree of warmth expressive of his attachment to his bleak hills, exclaimed, "What the devil's mon, d'ye think I dinna ken the craig o' Ailsa?"

They were eight days without putting into any port, except sending the boat on shore on the evening of the seventh at the request of Man, to procure some provisions for the passengers, who almost starving, having consumed the stock, which is usually provided for voyages of this kind, in a day or two after the storm abated. The reason of their being kept so long from port was a dead calm which had succeeded; and which the mariners, who are the most superstitious of all beings, attributed to there being Jonas on board. This opinion they inculcated among the Irish, who had paid half-a-crown for their passage in the ship, who were as ignorant as themselves, and much more mischievously. Unluckily, Holcroft was the person on whom their suspicions were lighted. They had discovered him to be a player, a profession which was at one time regarded by the universal consent of mankind as altogether profane. The common Irish in the hold were chiefly catholics, and the sixth day from their departure happened to be Easter-Sunday. Holcroft had sauntered off the quarter-deck, with a volume of "Hudibras" in his hand, and had walked to the other end of the vessel, when he found himself encircled by two or three fellows with most ferocious countenances, who were gazing earnestly at him, with looks expressive of loathing and venge. Most of the passengers were at breakfast, and there was no one on deck but these men, and a couple of the sailors, joined them. The peculiarity of their manner excited his notice ; and one of them asked him, his lips quivering with rage, " If he had not better be getting a prayer-book, than be reading plays upon that blessed day ? " Holcroft now perceived that the fellows were inebriated, and very imprudently, instead of soothing them, asked them if they imagined there was as much harm in reading a play as in getting drunk on that day, and so early in the morning. " By the holy father," replied the spokesman, " I know you. You are the Jonas, and by Jasus the ship will never see land till you are tossed overboard, you and your plays along with you : and sure it will be a great deal better that such a wicked wretch as you should go to the bottom, than that all the poor innocent souls in the ship should be lost." This speech entirely disconcerted him. The fellow's resolute tone, and the approbation which his companions discovered, were alarming. He, however, preserved presence of mind enough to assure them it was not a play-book that he was reading, and opened it to convince them, while he slunk away to the quarter-deck, which he gained not without the greatest difficulty. Mr. Holcroft arrived at Chester without any further accident.

CHAP. III.

MR. HOLCROFT had now the world once more before him ; and he resolved to write to such travelling companies as he could obtain any intelligence of. His knowledge of music, his talents as a singer, and his recent arrival from the Dublin theatre, were recommendations which procured him the offer of several engagements. He closed with one, in a company that was then at Leeds, in Yorkshire. In this, his evil fortune was again predominant. He found the affairs of the company in a state of the greatest disorder ; the players were despised in the town, and quarrelling with one another and the manager. Here, however, he discovered how necessary practice is to the profession of a player ; and perceived that, though some of his new associates could scarcely read, they could all, from the mere force of habit, speak better on the stage than he could.

In a few weeks, in consequence of continual bickerings and jealousies, most of the players deserted the manager ; and no others coming to supply their places, the company dissolved of

A letter had followed our luckless hero from Chester, —
g him to join another set of actors then at Hereford :
had been written nearly a month ; it was a hundred and ~~s~~ s across the country, and he did not know, if he set ther he should find them there ; or if he did, whether - ht now stand in need of his assistance. But his money was s time reduced so low, that it was necessary to come to an diate determination. With a heavy heart, then, and a ~~li~~ rse, did he begin another journey : and on the fifth day, ent inn by the road side, which was eight-and-twenty miles ~~fr~~ ereford, with the sum of nine-pence in his pocket ; and in ~~th~~ orning made his exit penniless. The fatigue he had alr~~eady~~ ndergone, and the scanty fare he had allowed himself, ha~~d~~ so duced his spirits, that he found considerable difficulty in per forming this last day's journey on an empty stomach : but ~~there~~ was no remedy. About four o'clock he ascended the hill that looks down upon that ancient city, at the sight of which a thousand anxieties took possession of his bosom. He inquired of the first person he met, with an emotion not easily to be expressed, if the comedians had left Hereford ; and, to his great joy, was answered that they had not. Faint, weary, and ready to drop with hunge~~r~~ he traversed the town to inquire for the manager : but it was on of the nights on which they did not perform, and the manager wa~~s~~ not to be found. He was then directed to his brother, who was ~~a~~ barber in the place ; and upon the family's observing his weakness and desiring to know if he was not well, he collected courage enough to tell them that he was greatly fatigued, having come ~~a~~ long journey, and for the last day not having broken his fast, ex cept at the brook. Notwithstanding this confession, in makin which he had evidently done great violence to his feelings, the heard it without offering him the least refreshment, or so much testifying either surprise or pity ; and he left the house with te in his eyes. When the players understood that a fresh mem was come to join them, they, from sympathy, very soon discove his situation ; and were not a little incensed at the story of barber.

The company into which Mr. Holcroft was now introduced that of the Kembles : the father of Mrs. Siddons was the man Mr. H. continued with this company some time ; and in the c of their peregrinations he visited Ludlow, Worcester, Leomi

Bewdly, Bromsgrove, and Droitwich ; in all which places he acted inferior parts. One of the actors in this company, of the name of Downing or Dunning, seems to have made a pretty strong impression on Mr. H.'s fancy, for he has left a very particular description of him. This stage-hero had a large, red, bottle-nose, with little intellect ; but he was tall, looked passably when made up for the stage, and had a tolerable voice, though monotonous. To hide the redness of his nose, it was his custom to powder it : but, unluckily, he drank brandy ; the humour that flowed to his nose made it irritable, and in the course of a scene the powder was usually rubbed off. His wife stood behind the scenes with the powder-puff ready, and exclaimed, when he came off, — "Curse it, George ! how you rub your poor nose ! Come here, and let me powder it. Do you think Alexander the Great had such a nose ? I am sure Juliet would never have married Romeo with such a bottle-nose. Upon my word, if your nose had been so red and large when you ran away with me from the boarding-school, I should never have stepped into the same chaise with you and your journeyman captain, I assure you." George seldom made any reply to these harangues, except "Pshaw, woman !" or by beginning to repeat his part.

In the year 1798, when Mr. Holcroft spent an evening with old Mrs. Kemble, and talked over past times with her, she gave a whimsical picture of this wife of Downing. Mrs. D. was addicted to drinking, exceedingly nervous, and snuffed when she spoke. She used to tell her own story as follows : "He calls himself Downing, ma'am, but his name is Dunning. I was a Quaker, ma'am, when he first knew me, and put to a boarding-school. He and one Chalmers (I suppose you have heard of that Chalmers, he gave himself the title of Captain) — Well, ma'am, while I was at the boarding-school, they came a courting to me. Dunning, my husband, that you see there, was a tall, handsome fellow enough ; he had not such a bottle-nose then, ma'am, nor such spindle legs ; so he put on a coat edged with gold lace, I don't know where he got it, and gave himself the airs of a gentleman. He thought I was a great fortune ; but, God help me, I had not a shilling ; and I believed him to be what he pretended, when all the while he was no better than a barber ; and this Captain Chalmers was his journeyman. So they persuaded me, innocent fool, to run away with them, thinking they had got a prize, and I thought the same ; so the biter was bit on both sides. So that is the history, ma'am, (me and Mr. Dunning."

This maudlin lady was often employed to receive the money at the play-house door, and was suspected of petty embezzlements to supply herself with liquor. Mr. Holcroft used sometimes to rally her a little unmercifully on her love of the bottle, and the adventure of the Captain. The dialogue is somewhat coarse, but it may serve as a sample of the tone of conversation which prevailed in provincial companies at that time. "It is very cold to night, Mr. Downing." "Yes, sir." "I hope you take care to keep yourself warm." "What do you mean, sir?" "Flannel, and a little comfort." "What comfort, sir?" "You know what I mean." "I know nothing about you, sir!" "A drop of cordial; lamb's wool is a good lining." "Hang your linings, sir; I know nothing about linings." "Nay, don't be angry; I have not said you are tipsy." "Hang your sayings, sir; I don't care for your sayings. Mr. Downing shall never set foot, after this night, on the same board with such an impertinent puppy." "Nay, my dear Mrs. Downing." "Yes, sir, you are no better; and if George Downing was a man he would soon teach you good manners." "He is well qualified my dear Mrs. D., for he practised upon many a block-head before he came to mine." "And what of that, sir? I understand you but a barber is as good as a cobbler at any time."

Now it must be allowed, that though there is not much wit and humour in all this, it is very easy and free spoken. Mr. Holcroft was young at the time, and probably ready enough to give into a joke which he found the common practice of the place. It may be remarked, by the way, that there is a peculiar tone of banter and irony, bordering on ribaldry, which seems almost inseparable from the profession of strolling players. For this many reasons might be given: 1. The contempt (often most undeserved, no doubt) which they are held by the world, and which they naturally reflect back on one another; for they must soon learn to despise a profession which they see despised by every one else, at least with the single exception which self-love contrives to reserve for us and 2. The circumstance that they live by repeating the wit of others and that they must naturally ape what they live by. In nine instances out of ten, however, this habitual temptation must produce impertinence instead of wit. 3. The custom of repeating things without meaning or consequence on the stage, must lead to the same freedom of speech when they are off. It is only acting a part. 4. They have not much else to do, and they assume a certain levity of manner as a resource against ennui, as well as to hide a sense of the mortifications and hardships they so often meet with. Lastly, their mode of life, which is always in companies, and in situations where they have an opportunity of becoming acquainted every moment with one another's weak sides, gives rise to a propensity to quizzing, as it does in all other open societies ; such as of boys at school, of collegians, among lawyers, &c.—But to return to our narrative.

The company of which old Mr. Kemble was the manager, was more respectable than many other companies of strolling players ; but it was not in so flourishing a condition as to place the manager beyond the reach of the immediate smiles or frowns of fortune. Of this the following anecdote may be cited as an instance. A benefit had been fixed for some of the family, in which Miss Kemble, then a little girl, was to come forward in some part, as a juvenile prodigy. The taste of the audience was not, it seems, so accommodating as in the present day, and the extreme youth of the performer disposed the gallery to noise and uproar, instead of admiration. Their turbulent dissatisfaction quite disconcerted the child, and she was retiring bashfully from the stage, when her mother, who was a woman of a high spirit, and alarmed for the success of her little actress, came forward, and, leading the child to the front of the house, made her repeat the fable of the Boys and the Frogs, which entirely turned the tide of popular opinion in her favour. What must the feelings of the same mother have been, when this child (afterwards Mrs. Siddons) became the admiration of the whole kingdom, the first seeing of whom was an event in every person's life never to be forgotten !

It may not be improper to remark in this place, that Mrs. Siddons first appeared in London about the year 1778, without exciting any great notice or expectation. She had acquired her fame in the country, before she was received in 1783 with such unbounded applause on the London theatres. There is a playful and lively letter from Mr. Holcroft to Miss Kemble (most probably Mrs. Siddons), dated 12th Feb., 1779, returning her thanks for the favour of her late visit to him while in town, and desiring his remembrances to theatrical friends in the country, and, among others, his Essex Mains to a Mr. Davis.

A difference with the manager (old Mr. Kemble) occasioned Mr. Holcroft to leave this company, from which he went to Stanton, which performed at Birmingham and in the neighbourhood, and sometimes made excursions to the north of England. A memorandum of Mr. Holcroft, dated 1799, gives some account of himself, and of one of his fellow-actors, while in this company. "A person called on me of the name of F——, who began asking if I knew him. I answered, no. He replied that it was likely enough, but that we had been acquainted when I was actor in Walsal, where he played the second fiddle, and doubt not but I should remember that we had often played at billiards together. I answered that I recollected nothing of his person, though I played at billiards with several people, and probably with him. I then asked, which was the best player of the two. He replied that, because he squinted, people thought he could play, but that, to the best of his recollection, he had won six or seven pounds of me, which greatly distressed me. Yes, said he, the loss of such a sum at that time (in 1773) would have so distressed me, that though I do forget multitudes of things and persons, I think I should not have forgotten such an incident. I was therefore persuaded he was much mistaken in the sum. In answer to this, he said, he had remarked to me at the time we were both upon the same lay, and finding I took offence at the expression, he had softened it by saying, we neither of us wish to lose our money. He therefore proposed that I should play by going halves with him when he played and betted against me. What degree of truth there was in all this, I cannot now exactly tell; only I know that I had a high spirit, and a detestation of gambling conspiracies, though at that time I played for money and wished to win. I was poor, neither did I then conceive it to be wrong. The man said, he should not have taken the liberty to come to a gentleman so high in the world (at this I could not smile) as I now was, had not Mr. Clementi told him I was without pride, and entirely free of access. He is a stout man, near six feet high, and lives at Birmingham, where he teaches violin, has daughters, whom he has taught to fiddle, play the harpsichord, &c., and sells music among his scholars. His business in London, he tells me, is to bring up his wife and daughters, leave them here, the latter for instruction; and that one of his motives for visiting me was to hear Fanny (Miss Holcroft) play."

In addition to ungain size, awkwardness, and squinting, he has a clownish gesticulation, and makes such strange contortions of face, as, were it not to avoid giving offence, would excite continual laughter. In talking of billiards, he spoke of a gentleman at Walsal, with whom he used to play, who came with his pockets full of guineas, and that the chinking of these excited in him the most extraordinary desire to win. Here he got up, and gave a picture, by gesticulating, squinting, and drawing his muscles awry, of the agitation he used to be in when going to strike the balls. Nothing could exceed the effect of his naïveté. The conclusion of his history of Walsal was, that, playing at billiards with Stanton, the manager, the latter complained of the largeness of the pockets, to which F—— replied, yes, they were very large, large indeed, as unconscionably large as his four dead shares, added to the five shares he received for the acting of his wife and children; which so affronted Stanton, that he discharged him the next week. He said he left Walsal with thirty pounds in his pocket, which he had won at billiards, promising his wife never to play more, and that he had kept his word. As he appeared to have been the industrious father of a family, I invited him to bring his daughters and dear Fanny, who did not then happen to be at home; but his left-handed, country breeding, or some other motive, made him decline fixing any time." *

To enable the reader to understand the satirical allusion to the manager's shares, which cost poor F—— his situation as second iddler in the company, it may be necessary to give a short account of the economy of a provincial theatre. This I cannot do better than by citing Mr. Holcroft's own words. "A company of travelling comedians, then, is a small kingdom, of which the manager is the monarch. Their code of laws seems to have existed, with few material variations, since the days of Shakespeare, who is, with great reason, the god of their idolatry. The person who is rich enough to furnish a wardrobe and scenes, commences manager, and has his privileges accordingly: if there are twenty persons in the company, for instance, the manager included, the receipts of the house, after all incidental expenses are deducted, are divided into four-and-twenty shares, four of which are called dead shares,

* One Keys, who was also a contemporary of Mr. H. in Stanton's company, and has since been a dancing-master, was the father of Mrs. Mills, who played the Spalled Child, Sophia, in "The Road to Ruin," &c.

and taken by the manager as payment for the use of his dresses and scenes; to these is added the share to which he is entitled as a performer. Our manager (Stanton) has five sons and daughters all ranked as performers, so that he sweeps eleven shares, the near half the profits of the theatre, into his pocket every night. This is a continual subject of discontent to the rest of the actors who are all, to a man, disaffected to the higher powers. They are however, most of them in debt to the manager, and of course chained to his galley, — a circumstance which he does not fail to remind them of whenever they are refractory.

“They appear to be a set of merry, thoughtless beings, laugh in the midst of poverty, and who never want a quotation of a story to recruit their spirits. When they get any money, they seem in haste to spend it, lest some tyrant, in the shape of a creditor, should snatch it from them. They have a circuit, or set of towns to which they resort when the time comes round; so that there are but three or four in our company who are not well known  I observe that the townspeople are continually railing at them, yet are exceedingly unhappy if they fail to return at appointed time. It is a saying among us, that a player’s sixpence does not go as far as a townsman’s groat; therefore, though the actors are continually abusing them for running in debt, they take good care to indemnify themselves, and are no great losers if they get ten shillings in the pound.”

This patriarchal manager, with his wife, sons, and daughters seems to have been not only an object of envy, but, from his blunders and stupidity, the butt of the whole company. An other instance which is related of his talent for absurdity is, that he wished to have Shylock, in the “Merchant of Venice,” play the dialect of Duke’s Place, and was positive Shakspeare intended it so. He once told the duke in “Othello,” a messenger was arraigned from the gallows, instead of the galleys; and in playing the part of Bardolph, where that worthy person, descanting on the fineness of his nose, says, “Behold these meteors, these exhalations,” he refused to lift his hands to heaven with a solemn flourish, as if he had really seen “the heavens on fire.”

CHAP. IV.

WHILE Mr. Holcroft was in this company, or a short time before he entered it, he married again. His second wife was the sister of a Mr. Tipler, of Nottingham; by her he had two children, — William, born in 1773, and Sophy, born at Cockermouth, in 1775. Her mother either died in child-bed of her, or shortly after. This marriage would have been a very happy one, had it not been embittered by scenes of continual distress and disappointment, which Mrs. H. bore with a resignation and sweetness of temper, which could not but endear her to a husband of Mr. Holcroft's character. There is a sort of Shandean manuscript of his, written at this time, and in which he gives an account of his own situation, crosses, poverty, &c. In this there are several passages expressive of the tenderest attachment to his wife, and which, from the amiable character he has drawn of her, she seems to have deserved. One of these will, I think, strongly paint the amiableness of his own heart. After describing a series of misfortunes, he breaks out into the following beautiful address to his wife: —

"Oh, Matilda! shall I ever forget thy tenderness and resignation? Or when in the bitterness of despair, beholding thee wan with watching thy sick infant, and sitting assiduously at thy needle to earn a morsel of bread, — when thou hast beheld the salt rheum of biting anguish scald my agonising cheek, with what tender love, what mild, what sweet persuasive, patience, thou hast comforted my soul, and made even misery smile in hope, and fond forgetfulness! Richer than all the monarchs of the east, Matilda, has thy kindness made me: the world affords not thy equal!"

Mr. Holcroft afterwards removed with his wife into Booth's company. She had a good figure, and her husband had taught her to sing, and instructed her sufficiently in the business of the stage to render her serviceable to the theatre. When at Cockermouth in 1775, Mr. Holcroft addressed a letter and a poem to David Garrick, which I shall here insert; both as they are curious in themselves, and are characteristic of the state of his feelings at the time. For the romantic extravagance of his appeal to Garrick's generosity, no other apology seems necessary, than the old adage, that drowning men catch at straws.

To David Garrick, Esq.

"SIR,

"I know of no excuse that I can make for the import of this address, but my feelings. They press hard upon me are not to be withstood. They have told me your sympathetic sighs for the distressed, and weeps with the child of sorrow. I believe they told me truth.

"I am a strolling comedian, have a wife and family, for I would fain provide, but have sometimes, notwithstanding strictest economy, found the task a very difficult one. I am near three hundred miles from London, in a company that in all human probability, soon be dispersed; my wife lying in an inn, and in circumstances that I cannot describe. I wish to eat the bread of idleness; I neither know, nor we know, any thing of luxury; and a trifling salary would make me affluent. I have played in the country with applause, and my friends, I am afraid, have flattered me: some of them have ranked me among the sons of genius, and I have, at times, been enough to believe them. I have succeeded best in low comedies and old men. I understand music very well, something of French fencing, and have a very quick memory, as I can repeat an under four lengths at six hours' notice. I have studied character, situation, dress, deliberation, enunciation, but above all, the eye and the manner; and have so far succeeded, as to be entirely at the disposal of my profession here in all those characters which nature has so happily qualified me for. I am afraid, sir, you think by this that I have undertaken to write my own panegyric. That, however, is far from my intention; neither do I wish for employment in any but a very subordinate situation. My wife is a good actress, but her timidity would always place her behind a Queen at the theatre. If you were to find me capable of anything better than an attendant, to your judgment would I cheerfully accede. I do not chuse to employ my wife, but would only engage her if I think we should both remember it with that enthusiasm of gratitude with which good minds are oppressed when they receive favours which they have no possible means of returning.

"I am, sir,

"Your very humble servant

"Cockermouth, in Cumberland, June 1st, 1775, at the house of George Bowes, hatter.

"P.S. With respect to the trifling poem inclosed, I meant only to ease my own heart by it : should it reach yours, it will be more than I can expect.

"HOPE; OR, THE DELUSION.

"ADVANCE, soft soother of the mind,
Oh ! hither bend, a welcome guest :
Sweet Hope ! stray hither, here thou'lt find
Those sanguine thoughts, that please thee best.

Fair fancy bring, thy darling child,
Deck'd in loose robes of Alpine white :
With thee, her happy parent, wild
She wings her bold, romantic flight.

Blest pair ! I'll sing, inspir'd by you,
Of wealth bestow'd to noble ends,
Of sweet enchanting scenes in view,
Of future times and faithful friends.

Tho' my sweet William, prattling youth,
For bread oft begs in accents meek ;
Matilda, fairest flower of truth,
Droops on my breast her dew-dipt cheek.

Tho' the big tears run down my face
To see her aspect wan and mild,
And hear her lov'd affection trace
My care-mark'd features in our child.

Tho' fortune lowly bows my neck,
And cares not for the wretch's groan, —
Yet smile but Hope, or Fancy beck,
And I'll ascend her star-built throne.

Now, now I mount ! Behold me rise !
Hope lends me strength, and Fancy wings,
Oh ! listen to the magic lies,
Which fleeting, faithless Fancy sings !

With Independence truly blest,
Of some neat cot she styles me lord,
Where Age and Labour love to rest,
Where healthy viands press the board.

Now lay me down, kind nymph, at ease
Beneath yon verdant mountain's brow,
Where wanton zephyrs fan the trees,
Where violets spring, and waters flow.

What joys — delusive charmer, hold !
Despair has seiz'd my thick'ning blood ;
Her lips how pale ! her cheek how cold !
Matilda faints for want of food !"

The foregoing stanzas have been given less for the poetry than the history they contain. The distress which they paint did not seem to reach Garrick's heart: at least Mr. Holcroft left Cockermouth some time after without having received an answer to his letter. Whether his wife died before or after he left Cockermouth I do not know; but there is an epitaph on Mrs. Holcroft, written about this period, in which he feelingly laments her loss.

"Beauty, Love, and Truth lie here:
 Passenger, a moment stay!
 Breathe a sigh, and drop a tear,
 O'er her much-lamented clay.

Death! thy dart is harmless now,
 Widow'd griefs thy stroke defy:
 Weak the terrors of thy brow
 To the wretch who longs to die."

At the time that Mr. Holcroft was at Cockermouth, he was Booth's company, which he had joined at Carlisle in the autumn of 1774. He had just then left Stanton's company, who were performing at Kendal. He was recommended to Booth by a friend of the name of Hatton, who was an excellent comedian, and the hero of the company. He had spoken in high terms of Holcroft's talents, who himself sent off a letter as his avant-courier, in which he undertook to do a great deal for very little. He engaged to perform all the old men, and principal low-comedy characters; was to be the music, that is, literally the sole accompaniment of all songs, &c. on his fiddle in the orchestra; he undertook to instruct the younger performers in singing and music, and to write out the different casts or parts in every new comedy; and, lastly, he was to furnish the theatre with several new pieces, newly published, but which he brought with him in manuscript; among the rest "Dr. Last in his Chariot," which character he himself performed. Here was certainly enough for one man to do; and for all these services, various and important as they were, he stipulated that he should be entitled to a share and a half of the profits of the theatre, which generally amounted to between four and five pounds a night whenever it opened, that is, three times a week. The proposed salary could not, therefore, amount to more than seven teen or eighteen shillings weekly.

In the above list of employments, which Mr. Holcroft undertook to fulfil, the capital attraction, and that which he believed no country manager could resist, was the character of Dr. Last, which he did in imitation of the London performers. The scene in which he produced the most effect was that of the doctor's examination. This, as I have heard it described, was a very laughable, if not a very pleasing, performance. Mr. Holcroft was naturally rather long-backed; and in order to give a ridiculous appearance to the doctor, he used to lean forwards, with his chin raised as high as possible into the air, and his body projecting proportionably behind; and in this frog-like attitude, with his eyes staring wide open, and his teeth chattering, he answered the questions that were put to him, in a harsh, tremulous voice, sometimes growling, and sometimes squeaking, and with such odd starts and twitches of countenance, that the effect produced upon the generality of spectators was altogether convulsive. The person who gave me this description said he thought the part a good deal overdone, but that it was a very entertaining caricature. Mr. Holcroft himself went through this part to gratify a friend, a very short time before his death. He said it always produced a very great effect whenever he acted it; but that the chief or only merit it had was that of being a close imitation of Weston's manner of doing it. *

* Weston is celebrated for his unrivalled power of face, for looking the fool more naturally than any one else. Mr. Holcroft speaks of him in the following manner in the "Theatrical Recorder."—"As an actor, I remember him well: to think of a few unrivalled performers, and to forget Weston, is impossible. The range of characters that he personated was confined. The parts in which he excited such uncommon emotion, were those of low humour. He was the most irresistible in those of perfect simplicity: his peculiar talent was the pure personification of nature. I do not think it possible for an actor to be less conscious than Weston appeared to be, that he was acting. While the audience was convulsed with laughter, he was perfectly unmoved: no look, no motion of the body, ever gave the least intimation that he knew himself to be Thomas Weston. Never for a moment was Thomas Weston present: it was always either Jerry Sneak, Doctor Last, Abel Drugger, Scrub, Sharp, or the very character, whatever it was, he stood there to perform; and it was performed with such a consistent and peculiar humour, it was so entirely distinct from any thing we call acting, and so perfect a resemblance of the person whom the pencil of the poet had depicted, that not only was the laughter excessive, nay, sometimes almost painful, but the most critical mind was entirely satisfied. I doubt if Garrick, or any other actor, had so complete a power of disguising himself, and of assuming a character with so little deviation from the conception he had previously formed. It was not only a perfect whole, but it was also unique. "He first appeared in tragedy, which he always considered as his forte, though he was utterly unqualified for it. It was much against his will that he was

The history of the company in which Mr. Holcroft was engaged, deserves notice from its singularity. The name of original founder of the company was Mills, a Scotchman. He his family had formerly travelled the country, playing nothing Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd." This they continued to do several years without either scenery or music. As the young branches of the family grew up, one of them became a scene-painter and some of the others learned to fiddle. They now, therefore, added scenes and music to the representation of their favou accidentally forced to play Scrub, in the 'Beaux' Stratagem,' when he threw one into raptures, except himself. Even the very boys followed him in streets, exclaiming, 'There — that's he that played Scrub!' His first appearance in London was at a booth in Bartholomew Fair. He was afterwards engaged by Foote, who was the first person who introduced him to public notice and who wrote the part of Jerry Sneak expressly for him. Several stories told of the readiness of his wit, and presence of mind.

"Shuter had long been the favourite of the galleries; and Weston, before was well known, appeared as a substitute for Shuter, in the part of Sir Shuter's name was in the play-bills; and when Weston appeared, the gallery vociferated, 'Shuter, Shuter!' Mrs. Clive played the part of Kitty Fry, was no less a favourite than the other. The uproar continued, and not could be heard but 'Shuter, Shuter!' As soon as it was possible to be heard, Weston, in his own inimitable and humorous manner, asked aloud, in a seriously stupid amazement, and pointing to Mrs. Clive, — 'Shoot her! Shoot her! Why should I shoot her? I am sure she plays her part very well!' apparent earnestness and simplicity with which he asked this question, were inimitable, and it so truly applied to the excellent acting of Mrs. Clive, that a burst of laughter was universal, and the applause which Weston deserved attended him through the part.

"Weston was no less remarkable for his dissipation and poverty, than for his comic excellence. It happened, on a day that his name was in the play-bill, that he was arrested for a small sum, which he applied to the managers to discharge; which request they refused. Being known to the bailiff, Weston prevailed on him and his follower to go with him to the play, where he placed himself and them in the front of the two-shilling gallery. Before the curtain drew up, an apology was made, that Mr. Weston, being ill, could not possibly attend; and it was therefore hoped another performer might supply his place. Weston rose, as he intended, and declared aloud, the apology was entirely false; he was there, well, and ready to do his part, but that he was in custody for a small debt, for which, though entreated, the managers had refused to give security. Weston had well foreseen the consequences: the managers were obliged to set him free. Another actor would have immediately been expelled the theatre; but for Weston no substitute could be found." Vol. ii. p. 112.

The reason has often been asked, why actors are imprudent and extravagant. An answer may be found in the very nature of their profession. They live in a world of fancy, of artificial life and gaiety, and necessarily become careless of the real consequences of their actions. They make realities of imaginary things, and very naturally turn realities into a jest. Besides, all persons are so who live in no settled prospects in life before them.

pastoral. They afterwards enlarged their circuit, and made excursions into the north of England: and though the loves of Patie and Peggy were a never-failing source of delight on the other side of the Tweed, their English auditors grew tired of this constant sameness. They therefore, after the performance of the "Gentle Shepherd," which was still the business of the evening, introduced a farce occasionally, as a great treat to the audience. Mills's daughters married players. This brought an accession of strength into the family, so that they were now able to act regular plays; and by degrees, Allan Ramsay, with his shepherds and shepherdesses, and flocks of bleating sheep, was entirely discarded. Still, however, during the lifetime of Mills, the whole business of the theatre, even to the shifting of the scenes, or making up of the dresses, was carried on in the circle of his own family. At his death, the property of the theatre was purchased by a Mr. Buck (formerly of Covent Garden theatre), who kept an inn at Penrith, and it was by him let out to Booth.

Mrs. Sparks, of Drury Lane theatre, was an actress in this company at the time Mr. Holcroft belonged to it, and the youngest daughter of Mills, the late manager. Mrs. Inchbald was playing in the same company, at Inverness, in Scotland, in 1773, or the winter of 1774. The company afterwards went to Glasgow, where, not being permitted to play, they were all in the utmost distress. The whole stock was detained for rent and board, &c., at an inn. From this awkward situation they were liberated by a young Scotchman, who had just joined the company in a kind of frolic, and who paid their score, and set them off to Kilmarnock, and from thence to Ayr, where they had a very brilliant run of good fortune.

Booth, the manager, was the same person who has since been well known as the inventor of the polygraphic art, and of the art of making cloth without spinning or weaving. He appears to have been always a man of much versatility of enterprise; and at this time added to his employments of manager and actor the profession of a portrait-painter. The first thing he did when he came to any town, was to wait on the magistrate, to ask leave for his company to play; or if this was refused, that he might have the honour of painting his picture. If his scenes and dresses were lying idle, he was the more busy with his pencil: and that tempting bait hung out at the shop windows, likenesses taken in this manner for half-a-guinea, seldom failed to fill his pocket while his company were starving.

CHAP. V.

MR. HOLCROFT continued in Booth's company about a year or half. He next joined Bates's company, which made the circuit of the principal towns on the east side of the north of England, including Durham, Sunderland, Darlington, Scarborough, Stockton-upon-Tees, &c.

It was some time in the year 1777, that Mr. Holcroft went with Mr. Shield (the celebrated composer, who was then one of the band in the same company) from Durham to Stockton-upon-Tees. Mr. Holcroft employed himself on the road in studying Lowth's Grammar, and reading Pope's Homer. The writers that we read in our youth are those for whom we generally retain the greatest fondness. Pope always continued a favourite with Mr. Holcroft, and held the highest place in his esteem after Milton, Shakspeare, and Dryden. He used often, in particular, to represent the character of Atticus, which he considered as the finest picture of satire in the language. Moral description, good sense, keen observation, and strong passion, are the qualities which he sought chiefly to have sought in poetry. He had therefore little regard even for the best of our descriptive poets, and often spoke with indifference, approaching to contempt, of Thomson, Akenside, &c. others. He was, however, at this time, exceedingly eager to make himself acquainted with all our English poets of any note and he was seldom without a volume of poetry in his pocket.

At the time that Bates's company were at Scarborough, Fisher, the late celebrated oboe player, gave concerts there, which were led by Dance, and in which a Miss Harrop (afterwards Mrs. Bates) was the principal vocal performer. Holcroft used to sing in the choruses. He at this time practised a good deal on the fiddle, which he continued ever after to do occasionally; but he never became a good performer. It was Bates who conducted the commemoration of Handel at Westminster Abbey.

Among the parts which Mr. Holcroft played most frequently were—Polonius, which he did respectably; Scrub, in the "Bea Stratagem"; Bundle, in the "Waterman"; and Abel Drugger.

acted this last character after he came to London, one night when Garrick happened to be present.

At Stockton-upon-Tees, Mr. Holcroft first became acquainted with Ritson, the antiquarian, and author of the "Treatise on Animal Food," who was afterwards one of his most intimate friends. He was at that time articled to an attorney in the town; but was, like most other young men of taste or talents, fonder of poetry than the law. The poet Cunningham was an actor in the same company. He was the intimate friend of Shield. He was, it seems, a man of a delicate constitution, of retired habits, and extreme sensibility, but an amiable and worthy man. The parts in which he acted with most success were mincing fops and pert coxcombs,—characters the most opposite to his own. He played Garrick's character of Fribble, in "Miss in her Teens." He also excelled in Comus. He was often subject to fits of absence; as a proof of which, he once forgot that he had played the Duke of Albany in "King Lear," and had returned to the door of the theatre for the second time before he recollected himself. Besides his descriptive poems, he wrote several prologues; and an opera called "The Lass with Speech," which was offered to the theatres, but never acted, and from which "The Lying Valet" was taken. He dedicated his poems to Garrick, who sent him two guineas on the occasion, which he returned, begging that they might be added to the theatrical fund. It seems he either did not want pecuniary remuneration for the compliment he had paid to Garrick, or he thought this a very inadequate one. When he was writing any thing, his room was strewed with little scraps of paper, on which he wrote down any thought as it occurred; and afterwards he had some difficulty in connecting these scattered, half-forgotten fragments together, before he could make out a fair copy.

At the time that Mr. Shield was most with him, he had been long in ill health, apparently in a decline; and this had given a deeper tinge of melancholy to the natural thoughtfulness of his disposition. A little before his death, he wrote the following lines, which seem to convey a presentiment of his fate.

"Sweet object of the zephyr's kiss,
Come rose, come courted by the hours,
Queen of the banks, the garden's bliss,
Come, and abash yon tawdry flow'rs.

'Why call us to revokeless doom?'
 With grief the op'ning buds reply,
 'Scarce suffer'd to expand our bloom, Scarce born, alas! before we die.'

"Man having pass'd appointed years,
 (Years are but days) the scene must close;
 And when fate's messenger appears,
 What is he but a withering rose?"

These lines can hardly fail of being acceptable to the reader, when he is told they were the last ever written by a man to whom we are indebted for some of the most pleasing and elegant pastoral descriptions in the language. It must abate something of the contempt with which we are too apt to mention the name of a strolling player, when we recollect that Cunningham was one.

Mr. Holcroft had never been satisfied with his employment as a strolling actor in the country. He sighed for the literary advantages and literary intercourse which London afforded. He was indeed the whole time labouring hard to cultivate his mind, and acquire whatever information was within his reach. But his opportunities were very confined. He had studied Shakspeare with the greatest ardour, and with some advantage to himself in his profession. Polonius was the character in which he was most successful: he also played Hamlet, and other parts, of which he was but an indifferent representative. I have been told, that Mr. Holcroft's acting, both in its excellences and defects, more resembled Bensley's than any other person's. The excellent sense and judgment of that able actor were almost entirely deprived of their effect by his disadvantages of voice and manner. Mr. Holcroft, in the performance of grave parts, had the same distinct, but harsh articulation, and the same unbending stiffness of deportment.

After wandering for seven years as an itinerant actor, with no very brilliant success, he resolved upon trying his fortune in London, and arrived there early in the latter end of 1777. His stay with the last company which he joined must therefore have been short. His separation from this company was I believe in some measure hastened by little disagreeable circumstances, but it was no doubt chiefly owing to the general bias of his inclination, to the desire and expectation of fame of some sort or other, either theatrical or literary, on which his mind had for some years been brooding. It is not likely that his success on the stage, though it

t in time have ensured him a livelihood in inferior parts, d ever have been such as to satisfy the ambition of an aspiring rigorous mind. It was however on his talents as an actor that st rested his hopes of pushing his fortune in London, and of amending himself to the favour of the public. But before allow him up to town, it may not be improper to take a retro- of the path we have already trod. There are some persons ce tastes, who may perhaps be disgusted with the meanness : adventures; and who may think the situation in which he em- ed in life, and the society into whose characters and manners ems to have entered with so much relish, unworthy of a man enius.

at it should be recollected, first, that men of genius do not ys choose their own profession or pursuit. In Mr. Holcroft's the question was, whether he should turn strolling player, arve.

condly, there are in this very profession, which is held in such empt, circumstances which must make a man of genius not averse to enter into it. In spite of the real misery, meanness, rance, and folly often to be found among its followers, the r as well as the poet lives in an ideal world.

ie scenes of petty vexation, poverty, and disappointment, h he has to encounter, are endless; so are the scenes of leur, pomp, and pleasure, in which he is as constantly an . If his waking thoughts are sometimes disagreeable, his ns are delightful, and the business of his life is to dream.

may be a reason why every one else should shun this pro- on as a pest, but it is for this very reason that the man of is may pass his time pleasantly and profitably in it. But let ear Mr. Holcroft's apology for his former way of life, which s to have been dictated with a view to his own feelings. ow then," he says *, "there is a certain set or society of men, ently to be met in straggling parties about this kingdom, who, peculiar kind of magic, will metamorphose an old barn, stable, ut-house, in such a wonderful manner, that the said barn, e, or out-house shall appear, according as it suits the will or ose of the said magicians, at one time a prince's palace; at her, a peasant's cottage; now the noisy receptacle of drunken vain. As a last desperate resource, when his money was nearly exhausted, he sat down and wrote a farce, called "The Crisis, or Love and Famine," which Mrs. Sheridan was prevailed on to read ; and this, with his musical knowledge (as he was able to sing in all choruses), procured him an engagement at twenty shillings a week. On his being engaged, Mr. Holcroft was desired by Mr. Sheridan to give in his cast of parts to Mr. Hopkins, the prompter ; and they were as follow : —

* Hugh Trevor, vol. iii.

Don Manuel	- - -	Kind Impostor.
Hardcastle	- - -	She Stoops to Conquer.
Justice Woodcock	- - -	Love in a Village.
Hodge	- - -	Ditto.
Giles	- - -	Maid of the Mill.
Ralph	- - -	Ditto.
Sir Harry Sycamore	- - -	Ditto.
Scrub	- - -	Beaux' Stratagem.
Sir Anthony Absolute	- - -	Rivals.
General Savage	- - -	School for Wives.
Colin Macleod	- - -	Faithless Lover.
Mortimer	- - -	Ditto.
Sir Benjamin Dove	- - -	Brothers.
Major O'Flaherty	- - -	West Indian.
Fulmer	- - -	Ditto.
Varland	- - -	Ditto.
Colonel Oldboy	- - -	Lionel and Clariissa.

It was in this last part that Mr. Holcroft particularly wished to have made his first appearance. The manner in which he procured a recommendation to Mrs. Sheridan, was through her cousin, Mrs. Greville. In consequence of this connection, he also obtained introductions to Mrs. Crewe, and several other persons of fashion, who interested themselves in his behalf ; and an epistolary intercourse commenced between him and Mr. Greville on subjects of taste and the theatre, which continued for some years.

His farce of "The Crisis" was, I believe, played but once, for the benefit of Hopkins, the prompter, when it was favourably received. This Mr. Hopkins, who had the regulation of the inferior parts in the theatre, entertained a very low opinion of Mr. Holcroft's powers as an actor ; and he remained unnoticed, till Mr. Sheridan by chance saw him in the part of Mungo, with which he was so much pleased as to order his weekly salary to be raised to five and twenty shillings. Both his salary and his reputation in the theatre seem now to have remained stationary during this and the following season, though he constantly attended the theatre to perform the most menial parts. The following extract from a letter addressed to Mr. Sheridan, will sufficiently explain both his situation and feelings at this time :—

“Depressed, dejected, chained by Misfortune to the rock of Despair, while the vultures Poverty and Disappointment are feasting with increase of appetite upon me, I have no chance of deliverance but from you. You, sir, I hope, will be my Alcides. Mr. Evans says, he must increase the deductions he already make from my salary (9s. per week), unless I can obtain your order to the contrary. It is scarcely possible I should maintain my family, which will shortly be increased, upon my present income. Were I not under deductions at the office, my receipts would very little exceed sixty pounds a year; and this I enjoy more through your favour than any consequence I am of to the theatre, though continually employed. But then it is either to sit in a senate or at card table, or to walk in a procession, or to sing in a chorus, which is all that the prompter, who has the direction of this kind of business, thinks me capable of. Nay, in so little esteem am I held by Mr. Hopkins, that he took the part of a dumb steward in “Love for Love” from another person, and made me do it; and when by your permission I played Mawworm, he said, had he been well and up, it should not have been so. I do not mention this as a subject of accusation against Mr. Hopkins, but merely to show that if I am consigned to his penetration, I am doomed to everlasting oblivion.

“Unhappily for me, when I performed Mawworm, you were not at the theatre. Interest rather than vanity makes me say, I was more successful than I had any reason to expect. The audience were in a continual laugh. I played Jerry Sneak for my own benefit last year, and with the same success; and if I could only be introduced to the town in old men and burletta singing, I know from former experience how soon I should be held in a very different estimation from what I am at present. You do not know, sir, how useful I could be upon a thousand emergencies in the theatre, if I were but thought of; but this I shall never be able to express, your express mandate is issued for that purpose.

“You have frequently been pleased to express a partiality towards me, as well as a favourable opinion of my abilities. But, sir, if you do not immediately interest yourself in my behalf, may grow grey, while I enjoy your favour without a possibility of confirming or increasing it. 'Who's the Dupe' prevented 'The Crisis' from being played last year: now you tell me you will talk to me after Christmas; in the mean time 'The Flitch of Bacon' and a new pantomime are preparing. I told those to whom I am indebted, I should have a chance of paying them soon, for that 'The Crisis' would come out before the holidays. When I said so, I believed that it would; but they will think I meant to deceive them."

The concluding sentence of this letter is remarkable, when we recollect the character of the celebrated man to whom it is addressed.

"In short, I am arrived at the labyrinth of delays, where suspense and all his busy imps are tormenting me — You alone, sir, hold the clue that can guide me out of it."

Mr. Sheridan, in spite of Mr. Holcroft's entreaties, was not inclined on this occasion to perform the part of Theseus; for he was still left to the mercy of the remorseless prompter, and had no opportunity of exerting his talents till "The Camp" came out (in 1780), when he endeavoured, as he expresses himself, to make a part of a foolish recruit, and succeeded; in consequence of which his salary was raised to thirty shillings weekly.

During the summer recesses of the years 1778 and 1779, Mr. Holcroft had not been idle, but had made excursions to the Canterbury, Portsmouth, and Nottingham theatres, where he moved in a higher range of parts, and escaped from the drudgery of choruses and processions. The state of his health appears to have been one inducement for his leaving town in 1779; for he says in a letter, dated from Nottingham, in June, that but for this consideration, he believes it would have been more profitable for him to have remained in London. In these excursions he seems to have established a pretty intimate correspondence with a Mr. Hughes, the Portsmouth or Plymouth manager; for we find the latter writing to him for a supply of performers, and Mr. Holcroft in answer complaining of his being able only to meet with a Mrs. Hervey, of whom he gives a very satirical portrait, and a Mr. Cubit, a singer, who, he observes, had already been with Mr. Hughes, and who never visited a company twice.

Mr. Holcroft's business at the theatre did not hinder him from pursuing his literary avocations. Besides "The Crisis," he had already written two other after-pieces, "The Shepherdess of the Alps," "The Maid of the Vale."

The following letter to Mrs. Sheridan gives an account of first of these :—

"MADAM,

"It is with a peculiar pleasure that I have, by Mr. Sheridan's desire, an opportunity of addressing you. I am indebted to your benevolence and interposition, for my first obtaining admission into the theatre, and shall ever remember it with respect and gratitude. Give me leave, madam, to intrude upon your patience for a moment, while I explain the motive of this address.—Mrs. Greaves, Mrs. Crewe, and some other ladies of fashion and consequence have kindly undertaken to patronise and recommend 'The Shepherdess of the Alps.' Mrs. Crewe has spoken to Mr. Sheridan concerning it, as he informed me last night, desiring me, at the same time, to send it to you, who he said would not only read it yourself, but put him in mind of it. I believe myself assured of your good wishes, when you read the beginning, and recollect that your late dear and worthy brother pointed out this subject to me, encouraged me to pursue it, and had not only undertaken to set it, but had actually composed two songs. Pardon me, madam, for introducing so melancholy a reflection. His example, for me, I might almost say his friendship, shall never be forgotten; let my condition in life hereafter be what it may; it does me much honour. You likewise, madam, have some share in this work: it was in consequence of your advice and observation that the comic part was introduced: it was at first intended to affect the nobler passions, and to have been entirely serious, but would not willingly appear too urgent; yet cannot forbear expressing some anxiety about the fate of my poor Shepherdess, who spent all the summer about it, certain (as I thought then) of coming out immediately.

"I am, madam," &c.

"The Maid of the Vale" was a translation from the Italian comic opera of "La Buona Figliola," which Mr. Arne, the son of Dr. Arne, employed him to alter and adapt to the English stage.

A good deal of altercation seems to have taken place between the author and musician, respecting the division of the profits of the piece; Mr. Holcroft claiming one half, to which his employer did not think him by any means entitled. In consequence, I believe, of these disagreements, the piece was not brought forward.

Mr. Holcroft afterwards offered his translation of this opera to Mr. King, the late actor, at that time manager of Sadler's Wells, by whom it was rejected. Mr. Holcroft, however, wrote several little pieces for Mr. King, which were brought out at this theatre. "The Noble Peasant" (which afterwards came out at the Haymarket) was originally intended to have been acted here. Mr. Holcroft always experienced from this gentleman the most liberal and friendly treatment; and was under considerable pecuniary obligations to him. Mr. Foote died in October, 1777, a few weeks before Mr. Holcroft came to town. In the spring of the following year, he published an Elegy on his Death, which was the first composition of his that had appeared in print (since his essays in the "Whitehall Evening Post"). It met with a favourable reception. He had always respected the character of Foote, had been personally known to him, and lamented his death in terms dictated by real feeling, as much as by the inspiration of the muse. At the same time, he published a short poem on Old Age, which was bound up with the elegy. In April, 1779, I find him desiring his father, who lived at Bath, to make inquiries respecting the prizes given at the Bath Eastern Vase, the subjects proposed, and the length of the poems. "I have an inclination," he says, "to become a candidate for fame at that temple of Apollo, not so much from a supposition that I shall gain the laurel, as because I think the plan deserves encouragement." The little deceptions of self-love cannot but sometimes excite a smile. — It may be proper to notice here, that Mr. Holcroft kept up at this period a constant correspondence with his father, whose wife rented a small house and garden either at or in the neighbourhood of Bath. The letters that passed between them do honour to the feelings of both parties. Mr. Holcroft was always eager to communicate the news of any good fortune that had befallen him, and ready to lend every assistance in his power to his father, who was still frequently in pecuniary difficulties. From one of these letters, it appears that Mr. Holcroft, among other employments, had engaged to write a paper, called the Actor, for the "Westminster Magazine"; and that he was secretary to a society, (the theatrical fund,) for which he received ten pounds a year. He also found time to write songs for V hall, several of which became very popular. Among these greatest favourite was the ballad, beginning, "Down the Bo and through the Mead," which was set to music by Shield. song, which is written in the Scottish dialect, has often been t for an old Scotch ballad, and has been actually printed in t lection of Scotch songs. Mr. Holcroft was one evening dri tea with some friends at White Conduit House, when the c was playing the tune of "Johnny and Mary." After they ha tened some time, a person in the next box began to descant r learnedly on the beauty of the Scotch airs, and the tendernes simplicity of their popular poetry, bringing this very ballad : illustration of his argument, neither the words nor music of w he said, any one now living was capable of imitating. Mr. croft, on this, took occasion to remark the strange force of p dice, and turning to the gentleman, interrupted his argum: informing him, that he himself was the author of the sor question: and that the tune was composed by his friend, Shield, who, I believe, was also there present. This song been composed for, and was originally sung at Vauxhall by celebrated Nan Catley. An Irish music-seller, at the St. I • Head in the Strand, had procured the words and music, and advertised them in his window to be sold. Mr. Shield was dentally passing, saw the music in the window, and went in t mand by what right the advertiser meant to publish his prop To this he received for answer, "By a very good right, for the music was composed by him (the vender), and that the v had been written by a friend for Miss Catley, whom he very knew." It was with difficulty that Mr. Shield, by informing that he was the author of the music, prevailed on the pret composer to relinquish his claim.

Mr. Holcroft, almost on his coming to town, married his wife; and soon after, she and Mr. Holcroft determined taking a small house, and furnishing it. They were, how diverted from this plan by a Mr. Turner, an upholsterer in O Road, who persuaded them that it would be much more a tageous to take a large house, which he would furnish, and them credit for any length of time they demanded. He said many persons by letting the upper part of their houses, not cleared the rent, but were often gainers. These arguments the additional motive of making a more creditable appearance, induced Mr. Holcroft to take a house in Southampton Buildings, which Mr. Turner furnished, as he had promised, to the value of 240*l*. But scarcely were the goods lodged in the house, before the upholsterer became a bankrupt, and his effects and bills were consigned over to his creditors, who immediately came on Mr. Holcroft for 160*l*., 80*l*. having been at first advanced to Mr. Turner for the furniture. This unexpected stroke completely ruined the prospects of our young housekeepers, and they were obliged to apply to several persons to prevent an execution, which was threatened: Mr. Holcroft might indeed have sold his goods for nearly the amount of the debt against him: but it seems that he was unwilling to see his property melt away under the hands of an auctioneer, and to have to begin the world again, after having, in a manner, realised all his hopes, by attaining a permanent and respectable establishment in life. He wrote to several persons to assist him in this emergency, with a degree of importunity which can only be excused by the severity of his disappointment, and a sense that it was undeserved on his part. He wrote to Mr. Greville, to a Mr. Laurel, to Mr. Sheridan, to the proprietors of Drury Lane theatre; to persons whom he had never seen or known, with a kind of wild desperation. These applications, indeed, showed no great knowledge of the world; but the abrupt appeals which he thus made to the humanity and generosity of others, at least proved that Mr. Holcroft was not without a strong sense of these qualities in his own breast, which made him believe they might be found to a romantic degree in others. His friend, Mr. King, at length relieved him from his immediate embarrassments by a loan of 80*l*. or 100*l*. This, however, was to be repaid; and, at no great distance of time, the same difficulties, and the same struggles to extricate himself from them, returned. At one time, great hopes were entertained from the expected arrival of a Mr. Marsac, a near relation of his wife, who had a handsome appointment in India; and who, in their present situation, it was thought, would be willing to assist them. But he did not arrive within the time which had been fixed. Mr. Holcroft then wrote to a lady, high in rank and literary pretension, but a stranger to him, stating the circumstances of his case, and inclosing a comedy, which he had written, as a voucher for the justice of his claims: she had been the laborious patroness of departed genius, and he thought might be the friend of living merit. But it seems the inference was not justified by the event. The comedy was returned unread : and, indeed, if she had read it, a very favourable verdict could scarcely have been expected, under the annexed penalty of a hundred pounds. Mr. Holcroft has recorded this extravagant and its result among the adventures of Wilmot, the usher, in "Hugh Trevor." Mr. Holcroft now looked forward, as a last resource, to the success of the comedy itself ("Duplicity"), which afterwards acted with applause; but such was the author's untoward fate, that even his success was attended with little advantage, and relieved his necessities but in part.

Mr. Holcroft had, at this time, few friends or acquaintance in London, and those few were very little able to afford him any material assistance. The oldest were Shield and Perry, both of whom he had known in strolling companies in the North: they had separated, had come to London about the same time, and met by chance. Shield first discovered Holcroft poring over an old book-stall in Goodge Street; they immediately recognised each other with a good deal of pleasure, and a friendly intercourse commenced, which was uninterrupted to the last. When the place of composer of the birth-day minuets at court became vacant by the death of Mr. Weideman, Mr. Holcroft applied to Mr. Greville to procure the place for Mr. Shield; with what success I do not know.

Mr. Shield, at the period we are speaking of, had an engagement at the Opera House. It was winter, and in consequence of some new piece, they had very long rehearsals every morning. One day he was detained longer than usual; his dinner hour was over, he felt himself very cold when he came out, and his attendance for so many hours had sharpened his appetite. He therefore proceeded up the Haymarket with a determination to get some refreshment at the first place that offered. He had strolled in St. Martin's Lane without meeting with anything that he liked till he came to a little bye-court, called Porridge Island; at the corner of which, in a dark, dirty-looking window, he discovered a large round of beef smoking, which strongly seconded the disposition he already felt in himself to satisfy his hunger. He did not, however, much like the appearance of the place; he looked again, the temptation grew stronger, and at last he ventured in. Having asked for dinner, he was shown into a room up one pair of stairs very large, but convenient and clean, where he found several already set down to dinner. He was invited to join them, and his great joy found both the fare and the accommodation excellent. But his attention was shortly much more powerfully engaged by the conversation which took place at the table. Philosophy, religion, politics, poetry, the belles lettres, were talked of, in such a manner as to show that every person there was familiar with such subjects, and that they formed the ordinary topics of conversation. Mr. Shield listened in a manner which denoted surprise and pleasure. The conversation at one time began to take a free turn, when a grave, elderly-looking man, who took the head of the table, addressed the new guest, telling him that he seemed a young man, and by his countenance showed signs of grace; that he would not have him mind what was said by persons who scarcely believed their own sophisms; that he himself when young had been attacked and staggered by the objections; that he had examined them all, and found them false and hollow. This diverted the discourse to other subjects which were more agreeable. The name of the person who had just addressed Mr. Shield, and who thus assumed the office of a censor, was Cannon; he was the son of an Irish bishop. He was advanced in years, and presided in the company with an air of authority that was partly submitted to in earnest, and partly hidden for the joke's sake. He regularly dined here every day. Entering the room, he first pulled off his great coat, and fastened it with two long pins to the back of a tall cane-worked old chair with knobs behind; and after disposing of his umbrella, he sat in those days was a great singularity, he used to pay his respects to the company with much formality, and then sit down in a fixed place, which was always kept for him; and for this privilege it seems he paid double price. If any stranger came in afterwards, and took possession of his seat, he would never sit in any other, but walked up and down the room in a restless manner till the person was gone. It was his constant custom to go with him a small pocket volume of Milton, or Young's Thoughts, in which he had made a great number of marginal notes; and as soon as dinner was over, he regularly took out his favourite authors, and, opening the book at random, read to the person who sat next him, whether a stranger or one of his usual company, to read aloud a certain passage which he thought very beautiful. This offer was of course declined by those who knew him, who in return begged that he would favour the company with it himself; which he did, at the same time repeating the remarks which he had made in the margin. He then very deliberately closed the book, and put it into his pocket again. Cannon was a man of letters, and had travelled. He spoke a very florid language, full of epithets and compound words, and professed to be engaged in an edition of Tibullus. Mr. Shield was so much amused with this old gentleman, and interested in the general conversation (not to say that the commons were excellent), that he was determined he would in future dine nowhere else; he was also eager to inform Holcroft of the discovery he had made, whom he invited to go along with him the next day, and who also became a very constant visitor. The persons who were generally present were Messieurs Shield, Nicholson, Holcroft, Cannon, &c., who formed themselves into a little society, which in compliment to the last-mentioned person, was called "the Cannonian." The president was rather tenacious of his opinions, and impatient of contradiction; and frequently some very warm altercations took place in consequence between him and Mr. Holcroft.

The other friend of Mr. Holcroft, mentioned above, was a young Scotchman, who had been in Booth's company with him, but soon quitted it, and came up to London two or three years before him. They had had a violent quarrel while they were in this company; but meeting again in London, with new objects before them, and where they were both to a considerable degree strangers, former disagreements were forgotten, and a friendly intercourse commenced. He strenuously advised Holcroft to turn his thoughts to writing, or reporting for the newspapers, which he himself had found a lucrative employment; but Holcroft declined the proposal, being more bent on pushing his way at the theatre.

The manner in which this friend of our author began his career in life, deserves a place in a work which is little else than a history of the difficulties and successes which attend the efforts of men of talents and literature.

Mr. Perry, whose connections were respectable, came to town with recommendations to a banking-house in the city, and with an intention of getting a place as clerk in some counting-house or public office. He delivered his letters, and his friends promised they would be on the look-out for him. He called once or twice to no purpose, and, as his time hung rather idly on his hands, he had employed him-writing one or two anonymous letters on the politics of the which were inserted in the "General Advertiser." It so happened that one of the partners in the house to which he had been recommended, had a principal share in this very paper: and when asked, he told him that he had heard of nothing in the way that shed; but taking out the "Advertiser," and showing him his letter in it, "If now," said he, "you could do something of kind, I might possibly be of service to you." Mr. Perry, with some eagerness, that he was the author of the letter. "indeed," says the other, "then come with me; we must come further talk together." So saying, he took our young man with him into another room; and after being closeted some time, it was arranged that Perry should be immediately employed as a writer and reporter for this paper, at a guinea and a half a week. The very next night there was to be an important debate in the House, and our young gentleman was to make his l'essai. As, however, he was entirely ignorant of the forms and rules of reporting, it was thought necessary to give him some verbal instructions; and he was told, that he should place himself as to be able to hear the speakers distinctly; that he should provide himself with a pencil and pocket-book, in which he must write down the speeches as privately as he could; but that as he was a stranger, and might be noticed the more on that account, if he came to interrupt him, he was to say nothing, but put half a guinea into his hand. Thus equipped and instructed, Mr. Perry repaired early to his post, and planted himself in the middle of the gallery, directly in front of the speaker. He had his pencil and pocket-book ready in his hand, and the instant the debate opened, he began to take notes with so much eagerness, and so little precaution, that a messenger came to him, and said, "Sir, you must give over writing." As he had been prepared for this event, he took half a guinea out of his pocket, and bending his hand behind his back offered the half guinea, which was lodged in the palm of it, to the door-keeper, who took it without saying a word, and he went on with his writing as before. But no sooner had he done so, than the man very quietly tapped him on the shoulder, and said, "Sir, you must give over writing." This second interruption was quite unexpected, and completely disconcerted our young reporter. He put his pencil and paper in his pocket, and leaving the remainder of the debate in a state of the utmost confusion, not expecting to remember a single sentence. He went home and related his ill-success; professing his inability to give any account of what he had heard. "But," said his friend, "you may at least try: you must surely recollect something of what passed." He said, "No: he had been in such a state of agitation the whole time, that it would be in vain to attempt it. As no one else had gone from the same office, and it was necessary to give some account of the debate the next morning, he was again urged to make the attempt, and at length commenced. He was left in the room by himself, and scarcely knowing what he began an account of the speech of Lord Nugent, who had been put to the question. He was surprised to find that he could recollect but a few first sentences. Still he despaired of being able to give a full account, but by degrees, one thing recalled another; he still kept on without knowing what was to follow, and when he had written one page, sent it down to the press. His hopes now revived, he returned to the charge, and writing under an impression that the words might every minute escape from his memory, he despatched sheet after sheet so vigorously, that the printers could hardly keep pace with him. They had now printed two pages and a half, and Lord Nugent was still speaking. At last the proprietor, who had at first dreaded a dearth of information, his fears were now alarmed the contrary way, came up to him and said, "When will this Lord Nugent's speech be done?" "I know of no other speaker the whole evening?" "Oh yes; there are yet eight more to come." The other laughed, and told him that he had quite mistaken the business; that in his way of writing he would fill a volume instead of a newspaper, and that he should begin again entirely, and instead of giving every word of the speech, merely repeat the heads of each speech, and a few of the most striking arguments. "Oh, is that all you want?" "Yes," said Perry, at once relieved from his terrors; "then I'm your friend." Accordingly he set to work afresh, cut down Lord Nugent's speech to half a column; the other speakers had a proportionally smaller share allotted them: and the report, thus curtailed, was the next morning noticed as the ablest and fullest that had been given of the debate. The person to whom this anecdote relates, has been long since dead. The public as the editor and proprietor of the only contemporary paper that remains.*

* This, it will be recollected, was written in 1810. Mr. Perry was then editor and proprietor of the "Morning Chronicle," the paper referred to in the text, died in 1821.

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

MR. HOLCROFT, as he had intended, let part of his house, in Southampton Buildings, to lodgers. Among other inmates, were Miss Kemble (afterwards Mrs. Whitelocke) and his friend N—. Holcroft used to take frequent opportunities of urging this gentleman to devote his talents to works of taste and imagination, and his mind teemed with the plots of comedies and subjects of novels, which he wished his friend to write. But as Mr. N—'s pursuits were of a totally different kind, it generally happened that Holcroft himself, in the end, executed the works which he had planned for another. Of this kind was his first novel, entitled "Alwyn, or the Gentleman Comedian," which it was originally intended that Mr. N— should compile from materials to be furnished by Holcroft, but of which he, in fact, only wrote a few short letters, evidently very much against the grain.

This novel came out in the year 1780, in two small volumes, and was printed for Fielding and Walker. What terms he procured for it with the bookseller, I do not know: its success was very moderate; and it was to his own novel that Mr. Holcroft alludes, when he complains, in "Hugh Trevor," that Wilmot's novel had been characterised in the "Monthly Review," as "a vulgar narrative of uninteresting occurrences."

The most curious part of it is the account which Mr. Holcroft has inserted of some of his own adventures as a strolling actor; for he himself is not the Gentleman Comedian. He has disguised his own name under that of Hil Kirk, and Alwyn is the hero of the piece. The story is as follows: Alwyn, a young man, who is patronised by a Mr. Stamford, in consequence of the friendship which had subsisted between him and Alwyn's father, who had saved his life, falls in love with Maria, the daughter of his guardian or master. His passion preys upon his health; and, in order to conceal it from the family, and to try what absence may do towards effecting a cure, he determines to leave his patron's house, and commence comedian. Young Stamford, Maria's brother, is alone in the secret, and is the person to whom Alwyn addresses the account of his subsequent adventures. Mr. Hilkirk, on whose story our author has chosen to engraft his own, in like manner falls in love with his master's niece, is on this account, and for his frequenting spouting clubs and billiard rooms, discarded from his service as a clerk, and betakes himself to the stage. These two romantic youths correspond together, and endeavour to console one another, by comparing their mutual mishaps,—the pains of absence, poverty, and hopeless love. Alwyn proceeds to Kendal, where he is received by the inhabitants with extraordinary marks of attention ; is supposed to be a gentleman in disguise ; is envied by the players ; and being invited to the assembly (a distinction never before allowed to any comedian), dances with a young, rich, lively widow, a West Indian, who falls in love with him, and makes him an offer of her hand and fortune. This the youth politely declines, his affections being irrevocably engaged to another ; and, in consequence of this, the lady, being piqued by his refusal, enters into a plot against him in concert with one of the players (a veteran in the corps, who was offended that the part of Romeo, which he had played for fifty years, should be taken from him, and given to Alwyn). His pocket-book is searched ; the name of the lady's rival is discovered ; and a letter is despatched to old Stamford, informing him of the liberties which Mr. Alwyn is said to have taken with his daughter's name, and the equal presumption he had shown in paying his addresses to the anonymous writer of the epistle. This letter, which is believed, gives a death-blow to his hopes. Maria Stamford, who had secretly returned his passion, is ashamed of her folly ; the father is shocked ; and the brother is incensed at the baseness and ingratitude of his friend. Another lover is now provided for Alwyn's mistress, the son of a Mr. Maitland, a rattling, thoughtless young fellow, who is not half sentiments enough for the young lady ; and is accordingly rejected by her. The father of young Maitland is represented as an odd character, a half-crazy humourist, who, like the people of Laputa, makes every thing a subject of mathematical demonstration. He calculates the height and size of meteors, and is made to follow every ignis fatuus that he sees, through bog and briar. His graceless son ties a lantern to the house-dog's tail, and sends his father on a bootle chase after it : the dog escapes from his keeper, gets in at the library window with his meteorological apparatus about him, and sets fire to the house. Maitland Hall is converted into a heap ruins; and what is worse, Mr. Maitland's strong box, containing nearly all his property, is lost. Mr. Stamford, his son, and daughter, are on a visit there at the time; and Maria Stamford must have perished in the flames, but that Alwyn — the ungrateful, the supposed worthless Alwyn — who had left the Kendal company and was travelling homeward, happens at that instant to be passing by, and comes in time to rescue his lovely mistress from the flames. He however remains unknown, and pursues his journey. Tom Maitland's fortune being thus dissipated by his frolic, it becomes a point of honour that Maria should give up her scruples, and join her hand to his; when this, now almost inevitable event, is put a stop to by a discovery,—that it was not the dog Pompey that had set fire to the house, but a gang of thieves, who had committed this flagrant act in order to carry off old Maitland's strong box: that they had been detected, and their prize secured by the vigilance and activity of Alwyn's friend, Hilkirk, who now appears to be the son of his former master, Seldon, and who is rewarded with the hand of his old sweetheart, Julia Gowland, for the difficulties he has had to encounter, and to which he was purposely exposed by his father to enable him to bear adversity, and make a man of him. At the same time, Alwyn is recognised by a rich uncle, who adopts him as his heir; the story of the anonymous letter, and of his pretended treachery, is cleared up, and the whole ends happily in marriage.

There is in this story neither much probability nor much invention. The characters, such as they are, are tolerably supported: but some of the attempts at humour which are inserted, shock all common sense. Such are the accounts of the schoolmaster, the Methodist parson, the mathematical calculation of the reasons for marrying, &c. These, however, were not written by Holcroft, but by his friend. The reason why men of real and great abilities do not succeed in different kinds of writing, is, perhaps, less for want of power, than of industry and inclination. They naturally set the highest value on that department of taste or genius to which they have devoted themselves, and they have not respect enough for any other to take the pains necessary to excel in it. Thus the philosopher and man of science is apt to think he pays a sufficient compliment to the efforts of humour or fancy, if he only unbends his mind to engage in them; that any thing is good enough for a novel, or poem; and that the absence of wisdom is wit.

The character of Handford, Alwyn's uncle, is the most amusing and original in the work : let it speak for itself.

This gentleman had conceived the idea of establishing a hospital for animals, the consequences of which he describes thus :

"I am pestered, plagued, teased, tormented to death. I believe all the cats in Christendom are assembled in Oxfordshire. I am obliged to hire a clerk to pay the people ; and the village where I live is become a constant fair. A fellow has set up the sign of the Three Blind Kittens, and has the impudence to tell the neighbours, that if my whims and my money only hold out for twelve months, he shall not care a fig for the king. I thought I should prevent this inundation, by buying up all the old cats, and confining them in convents and monasteries of my own : but the value of the breeders is increased to such a degree, that I do not believe my whole fortune is capable of the purchase. Besides, I am made an ass of. A rascal, who is a known sharper in the parts, hearing of the aversion I had to cruelty, bought an old, blind-eyed horse, that was going to the dogs, for five shillings ; and taking a hammer in his hand, watched an opportunity of finding me alone, and addressed me in the following manner : ' Look, master, I know that you don't love to see any dumb creature abused, and so, if you don't give me ten pounds, why I shall sell out this old rip's odd eye with the sharp end of this here hammer now, before your face.' Aye, and the villain would have done too, if I had not instantly complied : but what was worse, that abominable scoundrel had the audacity to tell me, when I was about to deliver the horse first, for fear he should extort a further sum from me, that he had more honour than to break his word. A whelp of a boy had yesterday caught a young hedgehog, perceiving me, threw it into the water to make it extend its limbs ; then with the rough side of a knotty stick sawed upon them ; the creature cried like a child ; and when I ordered him to do so, he told me he would not, till I had given him sixpence. There is nothing so something worse than all this. The avaricious rascals, when they can find nothing that they think will excite my pity, disable the first animal which is not dignified with the title of Christian, and then bring it to me as an object worthy of commiseration ; so that in fact, instead of protecting, I destroy. The women have entertained a notion that I hate two-legged animals : and one of them called after me the other day, to tell me I was an old rogue.

I had better give my money to the poor, than keep a parcel of dogs and cats that eat up the village. I perceive it is in vain attempting carrying on the scheme much longer, and then my invalids will be worse off than they were before."

His account was probably intended by the author as an indictment upon his friend Ritson's arguments on the inhumanity of killing animal food.

Mr. Holcroft may now be considered as having commenced re-actor; or in other words, he now began to write constantly for the booksellers. He was employed by them to write a pamphlet under the name of William Vincent, Esq., of Gray's Inn, containing an account of the riots in 1780. For this purpose he had attended the trials at the Old Bailey, where he was the means of saving the life of an innocent man, who was brought there as a felon. I have heard Mr. Holcroft mention this circumstance, with tears of pleasure at the recollection. One of his most natural feelings was a strong sense of the value of human life; his having been in more than one instance an instrument in saving it, was a subject of the most grateful reflection to him.

A young man was brought to the bar, and tried as one of the rioters. The witness against him swore, that as he was standing in a shop, where he had taken refuge, at the bottom of Holborn, he saw the prisoner coming down Holborn Hill, at the head of a mob of rioters, with a drawn sword in his hand, which he brandished furiously in the air. The witness swore positively to the fact, and there is little doubt that the prisoner would have been found guilty, if, by great good fortune, Mr. Holcroft, who was present, had notes of the evidence, had not recollected the prisoner's name.

He felt himself much agitated while the evidence was being given; and when it was over, he addressed the judge, and begged that he might be admitted as an evidence, for that he had something very material to depose to the prisoner's innocence. He declared that he had been present at the real transaction; that he had been standing at the corner of one of the streets near the bottom of Holborn when the rioters passed; that the prisoner was not one of them, but that some time after they were gone by, he had seen the prisoner, who was walking quietly along the street, carrying a sword, which had probably been dropped in some scuffle between some of the rioters, and carry it away with him. This he said of the whole of the transaction, and that the circumstances of his marching at the head of the mob, and brandishing it in a threatening manner, were utterly false. This evidence so clear and satisfactory, that the man was acquitted. Holcroft was the judge on this occasion. Mr. Holcroft mentions another anecdote which happened at the same time the prisoners were tried and convicted in that wholesale manner upon such slender evidence, that it was not easy for the judge, whether guilty or not. A man with a strong, sensible countenance, after sentence of condemnation had been pronounced upon him, muttered to himself, in a scarcely audible voice, "evidently without intending to excite any one's notice: and sweet—innocent by G—d!"

CHAP. II.

MR. HOLCROFT'S first comedy, called "Duplicity," was first performed on the 10th of October, 1781. It had been offered to Mr. Harris, and was acted at Covent Garden. The prologue was written by Mr. N. The applause it met with, both on the first night and afterwards, was very great. Mr. Holcroft's feelings on this occasion were expressed in a manner honourable to himself in a letter to Greville, dated October 18., the day after it was acted.

"SIR,

"I received your very obliging letter last night, and was going to the theatre, and had not time to answer it till to-day. Indeed, sir, I do not find myself so much flattered by the favourable opinion which, as far as I am able to come at it, the town entertains of me, as I am by your friendship and patronage. It is true I have had great difficulties to encounter, and the unhappy effects of a narrow education to surmount; but this distinguished is more than a compensation for the pains I have taken, and the conflicts I have had with poverty, and their dismal attendants. I am successful—I am happy—I shall acquire the means of making my father, my family, and my friends happy. These are the purest sources of satisfaction, and which, as I have reason to know, both you and Mrs. Greville most intimately feel. My greatest danger is the possibility of supporting the new character I have undertaken, with d nimity, moderation, and ease, which are so essential to real worth. Vanity is continually spreading the net for pride, and those who are never entrapped are either very strong or very cunning. To be successful, I have now only to be industrious: having escaped the Dog of Hell, the Elysian fields are before me, if I have but taste and prudence to select the sweets. But this egotism is a species of the folly I have been declaiming against."

Mr. Greville, it may be necessary to add here, had perused Mr. Holcroft's piece before it came out, and had suggested some alterations both in the plot and language. Several were also made by Mr. Holcroft in the course of the rehearsals, and more by Mr. Harris; some of them against the author's judgment.

Mr. Holcroft now considered his fame as established, and his fortune as already made. The author of a successful and admired comedy he thought had a passport which would carry him securely through the world. In these flattering hopes he was unhappily deceived.

He also wrote on the same day to his father, in terms which his success and the warmth of his affection dictated.

"MY DEAR FATHER,

"I know that a short letter will be acceptable to you rather than none, especially on this occasion. My piece is come out at Covent Garden theatre, under the title of 'Duplicity.' You may perhaps have heard some account of its reception from the newspapers: its success has been very flattering, and no circumstance relative to it gives me more satisfaction than that I shall now be enabled to provide for my dear father."

Only three days after the date of the preceding letters, his brilliant prospects were dissipated, and we find him addressing the following letter to Mr. Harris:—

"SIR,

"It is with reluctance I begin to write to you on the present subject; but my feelings are too powerful to be resisted. My labours have been great; my cares, hopes, and fears innumerable, and just at the moment when I was to be rewarded, to see my golden dreams vanish, to have the blessings I had so hardly earned snatched from me, is more than I can support in silence. It is not now, sir, vanity in me to say the comedy is deserving of reward; every body says so, many say much more, at least to me. Had it been brought out at a good time of the year, I should not have gained less than five hundred pounds by it. But to be played at the most barren of all seasons, and when the fineness of the weather concurs to make it still worse, is certainly a severe fate; and I appeal to you, sir, whether it is a misfortune the whole weight of which should be borne by a man who has strained every faculty, and endured every kind of mental torture, to give others pleasure. Again, though I have no doubt but you thought it best, yet it is the opinion of every body that the playing the piece at intervals, so contrary to the established mode, has thrown a damp upon it of the most stagnating kind. There is not a person I meet, who does not ask the reason with a face of wonder. This you know was not with my judgment; nay, I was exceedingly vexed when I first saw another play advertised over its head. What added still more to the surprise of the town, was to hear it given out for Tuesday, and to see it put off till Wednesday, in order to give place to an old piece, of which they therefore concluded you had greater expectations than of the new comedy. They could not know your real motive. The concluding stroke thus far finishes this melancholy tragedy. You told me my night should be on the Friday or Saturday; I objected to the first, and you agreed to the other: but circumstances alter — you allege the business of the theatre — I am obliged to take the Friday, and ‘King Arthur,’ with every force of novelty, dress, decoration, &c., &c., is opposed to me at a time when there is scarcely one full audience of play-going people in town. The consequence is, the profits of my first and best night are twenty pounds. I appeal to you, sir, whether I have not a claim to some reparation. I wish you to allow me a certain sum for my nights; what, I leave to your candour. My hopes are so lowered that my views now are not very extravagant. If you think I have reason, you will be kind enough to inform me what you think proper to give; and then, sir, you will do with the piece whatever you think fit.”

The next night that the comedy was played for the author's benefit, it did not clear the expenses of the house; and Mr. Harris then said, that, unless it was commanded by the king, he should not think of playing it any more; but, at the same time, desired Mr. Holocroft to draw on the theatre for a hundred pounds. This sum, with the price which he got for it from the booksellers, was ill that he cleared by this his first comedy. It was shortly after published with a very well written preface.

Mr. Harris appears to have behaved in a liberal and friendly manner on this occasion. Mr. Holcroft afterwards called on him, and he proposed that the play should be laid by for a time, till he had a strong after-piece to play with it. This set Mr. Holcroft's imagination at work again, and he conceived the idea of writing a pastoral, and laying the scene in Ireland, so as to have an opportunity of introducing all the good Irish music. I do not know whether he ever executed this idea.

After the appearance of "Duplicity," Mr. Holcroft wrote to Mr. Linley to decline singing in the choruses and oratorios. His salary had been raised by Mr. Sheridan to two pounds a week, but still Mr. Holcroft seems to have been dissatisfied with not being brought forward in considerable parts; and he entertained thoughts of going to Ireland as an actor, unless a more respectable class of characters was assigned him at the theatre. He seems to have thought it inconsistent, not only with his dignity, but with his interest, as an author, to appear only in the lowest and most insignificant parts. I ought to have mentioned above, that when his own play of "Duplicity" was acted at the other house, Mr. Wewitzer being taken ill, he had played the part of Vandervelt at an hour's notice, which he continued to do afterwards. He also tried to procure an engagement with Mr. Colman, this year, at the Haymarket, but I believe ineffectually.

A project, which about this time engaged a good deal of Mr. Holcroft's attention, and excited very sanguine hopes in him, was the pretended discovery of the polygraphic art. The person who set this plan on foot, as we have before noticed, was Booth, the manager of one of the theatrical companies to which Mr. Holcroft had belonged. He undertook, by some mechanical process, to produce copies of the old masters, such as Titian and Rubens, which, both in colour and execution, should not be distinguishable from the originals, and which were to be sold as cheap, or cheaper, than a common coloured print. This certainly was promising great things, if the performance had been answerable. Mr. Holcroft was so full of this scheme, and of the golden advantages it held out, that Booth having applied to him to assist him in it, and become a partner in the profits, he wrote to Mr. Greville, informing him of his sudden good fortune; and indeed offering him a share in so lucrative an undertaking. Mr. Greville, however, seems to have thought the success not so certain; and it was not long before Mr. Holcroft began to incline to his opinion. In his next letter to this gentleman, he confesses that he entertained some doubts on the subject, especially since he had heard that the same scheme had been tried before, and had failed; and further, that there were not half a dozen artists in the kingdom who could copy the best pictures well enough to make it an object. In fact, this last observation betrayed the real secret: after an imperfect outline, or rude sketch, had been struck off by a mechanical operation, any bungling artist, who could be found to do it cheap enough, was employed to finish the picture. So that, after all, this new mode of superseding the necessity of copying the old masters, was nothing more than an attempt to set up a cheap wholesale manufactory of bad copies of good pictures. Mr. Holcroft, however, though his ardour very soon cooled, was willing to wait till he had seen the specimens which Mr. Booth was busy in making of some famous picture, but which he was very backward in producing. The subsequent fate of this polygraphic scheme is well known to the public. To excuse Mr. Holcroft's credulity on this occasion, it may be remarked, that it was long before he had paid any particular attention to the subject of painting; that he was really and truly a novice in the art; and, probably, would not have been much struck himself with the difference between one of these polygraphic imitations and a real Titian or Rubens.

CHAP. III.

IN the years 1781 and 1782, Mr. Holcroft published a poem called "The Sceptic," and "The Family Picture *," a collection of tales, partly compiled, and partly original. Neither of these works seems to have held a very high place in his estimation. Of the former

* "The Family Picture," I think, from memory, was published by Lockyer Davis, in 1781, and "The Sceptic" a year or more afterwards. The latter work has no plan, but in some parts it shows a more extensive power of imagination and strength of general induction, than he had before exhibited in any of his writings. The colloquial language of the connecting parts of his "Family Picture" is poor and inelegant; and has none of that easy, clear, and unaffected spirit which characterises his "Tales of the Castle," and still more his "Hurricane."

says, in a letter to a friend, that it was written in haste, that believes it ought to have been treated according to Horace's axiom, "Nonum prematur in annum;" and that though he was assed with some parts in the writing, he is afraid he should not so in the reading of them. Of the "Tales," he says, that he did expect to increase his reputation by them, though he hoped he could not lessen it.

About this time an offer was made him by Mr. Greville to reside in his house, which he had the good sense respectfully to decline. He observed, that it was difficult for people with the best temper and intentions, and who are upon a perfect equality, to live together without harbouring little dis gusts, or fancying supposed neglects; and that, with respect to himself, he was conscious of aims and peculiarities which it was his duty to keep behind the curtain as much as possible. His sole reason, therefore, for declining Mr. Greville's offer, he declared, was the fear of declining his good opinion by accepting it.

His mind now teemed with dramatic projects, plots, characters, and incidents; his ambition was to write elegant comedy, and he was sensible of the disadvantages under which he laboured in this respect, both from education, and the sphere of life in which he had hitherto chiefly moved. He wished to get a nearer and more intimate view of the manners of high life, that he might be able to scribe its refinements, or ridicule its absurdities, with more effect. He also wished, for the same reason, to acquaint himself, by actual observation, with foreign manners. Both these ends could be answered by obtaining admission into the ambassador's suite, which was then (1783) setting off for Paris; and he made application to several persons of consequence for this purpose, but without obtaining his immediate object. He, however, so far succeeded, as to obtain some respectable introductions abroad.

Lord Carmarthen was at first talked of as ambassador, and Mr. Holcroft, by the interest of Mrs. Harcourt and Mrs. Greville, had an interview with his lordship, in which he was informed that no other person had been fixed upon to go to Paris. This was the case of Manchester; and he now applied to the Duchess of Devonshire, I believe through Mrs. Siddons, for a recommendation to the duke to go out with him as under-secretary, or in any other situation in which he might be of service as a literary man. He thought that a salary was not his object, and that his only motive was to gain some little knowledge of the manners of a court, and of foreign countries. The only advantage he reaped from this application was, that he obtained the honour of some commissions to execute for her Grace at Paris, and the notice of one or two persons of consequence while he was there.*

* To dance attendance on the great seems, at this period of his life, to have been very much Mr. Holcroft's fate; but it certainly was an office for which he was by nature but indifferently fitted. In the present instance, his chief solicitude was to obtain an insight into the character and pursuits of the fashionable world. The ordeal he went through for this purpose must frequently have been a severe one to his feelings. But as far as his present object was concerned, even the repulses he met with, or the distance at which he was kept, would still, in some measure, advance him towards the end he had in view. He seems to have profited by his experience, and has left several lively sketches of that part of the manners of the great which relates to their intercourse with men of letters. I do not know that the following picture is true in all its particulars, but the general feelings it describes were suggested to him by the reception he met with on his application to the Duchess of Devonshire.

"On another occasion, an actress, who, strange to tell, happened, very deservedly, to be popular, and whom, before she arrived at the dignity of a London theatre, I had known in the country, recommended me to a duchess. To this duchess I went day after day; and day after day was subjected for hours to the prying, unmannered insolence of her countless lacqueys. This time she was not yet stirring, though it was two o'clock in the afternoon; the next, she was engaged with an Italian vender of artificial flowers; the day after, the prince, and the devil does not know who beside, were with her; and so on till patience and spleen were at daggers drawn. At last, from the hall I was introduced to the drawing-room, where I was half amazed to find myself. Could it be real? Should I, after all, see a creature so elevated; so unlike the poor compendium of flesh and blood with which I crawled about the earth? Why, it was to be hoped that I should! Still she did not come; and I stood fixed, gazing at the objects around me, longer perhaps than I can now well guess. The carpet was so rich, that I was afraid my shoes would disgrace it! The chairs were so superb, that I should insult them by sitting down! The sofas swelled in such luxurious state, that for an author to breathe upon them would be contamination! I made the daring experiment of pressing with a single finger upon the proud cushion; and the moment the pressure was removed, it rose again with elastic arrogance; an apt prototype of the dignity it was meant to sustain. Though alone, I blushed at my own littleness! Two or three times the familiars of the mansion skipped and glided by me; in at this door, and out at that; seeing, yet not noticing me. It was well they did not, or I should have sunk with the dread of being mistaken for a thief, that had gained a furtive entrance to load himself with some parcel of the magnificence that to poverty appeared so tempting! This time, however, I was not wholly disappointed: I had a sight of the duchess, or rather a glimpse. 'Her carriage was waiting.' She had been so infinitely delayed by my lord and my lady, and his highness, and Signora!—Was exceedingly sorry!—Would speak to me another time, to-morrow at three o'clock, but had not a moment to spare at present, and so vanished! Shall I say she treated me proudly, and made me feel my insignificance? No; the little that she did say was affable; the tone was conciliating.

Mr. Holcroft, being still determined on a visit to the continent, cured an engagement with the editor of a newspaper, the Morning Herald, "to send over paragraphs relating to the events of the day, public amusements, fashions, &c., for which he was to receive a guinea and a half a week, and a similar engagement with another, Mr. John Rivington, to furnish him with notices of new books, translations, &c. It was so arranged, that his salary from his newspaper-office should be received by Mrs. Holcroft in his absence, for the immediate use of the family, and Rivington was to supply him with money for his expenses at Paris.

Mr. Holcroft's family consisted, at this time, of his wife and three children, only one of whom, Fanny, was by his present wife. William, the eldest, was by his first wife, and Sophy and William were by his second wife, whom he lost just before he left the country.

The two children, after her death, were for some time under the care of their uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Tipler, at Nottingham. When Mr. Holcroft became settled in Southampton Buildings, they were sent for up to town. The boy William was his greatest favourite; he was now (1783) between nine and ten years old; he was a very forward and intelligent child, could speak French with considerable fluency, and his father, in order to perfect him in the language, determined to take him with him, and afterwards to send him to a boarding-school in France.

Matters being thus arranged, Mr. Holcroft set out for Paris in the beginning of April, 1783, which place he reached a few days later. The first appearance of this capital does not seem to have exceeded his expectations. He complained of the narrowness and dirtiness of the streets, of the meanness of the shops, and of the ruined state of the principal public buildings. His chief attention, however, was directed to the discovery of new publications, of several of which he proposed translations to Rivington, eye encouraging, and the countenance expressed the habitual desire of conciliating kindness. But these were only aggravating circumstances, that showed the desirableness of that intercourse which to me was unattainable. I say to me, those who had a less delicate sense of propriety, who were more importunate, more intruding, and whose forehead was proof against repulse, were more successful. By such people she was besieged; on such she lavished her favours, as report said that she impoverished herself; for a tale of distress, whether true or real, if obtruded upon her, she knew not how to resist."—Knights of the North, vol. iii.

and most of which he afterwards executed for another bookseller. Among these were the "Tales of the Castle," by Madame Genlis, "Caroline of Litchfield," "The Amours of Peter the Long," "Memoirs of De Tott," "Savary's Travels in Egypt," "An Account of the Manners and Treatment of Animals," by D'Obsorville, &c. This last publication he recommends as a curious work in a letter to Mr. Greville, and observes that, from the account there given, it is evident that the Newmarket jockeys had learned the first principles of their art from the Arabs. His translation of the "Tales of the Castle" went through several editions, and introduced Mr. Holcroft to a correspondence, and afterwards to a personal acquaintance, with the authoress. Most if not all of these translations were done for the Robinsons.

Mr. Holcroft made several friends at Paris, the chief of whom were Mercier, and a Mr. Bonneville (the translator of the "Théâtre Allemand,") of whom he had a high opinion; but Bonneville afterwards came to England, and they quarrelled. Of Mercier, the celebrated author of the "Dramas," and "The Year 2500," there will be occasion to speak hereafter. Either through these friends, or through the letters he brought with him, he was introduced to several persons of rank and literary pretension. Among them were the Duke and Duchess of Chartres, the Count de Catuelan, the Chevalier Macdonald, the Marquis de Dampiere, and others. He was desired by the Duke and Duchess of Chartres to read some scenes of Shakspeare to themselves and friends, with which, he says, they seemed more than satisfied. He appears afterwards to have entered into some discussion with the Count de Catuelan with respect to the comparative merits of Shakspeare and the French poets; for, on the 24th of June, he addressed a short note to the count, with a poem enclosed, on this subject. I shall here insert both, as well to show the zeal with which Mr. Holcroft defended his great countryman while abroad, as for the sake of the manner in which it is done.

"SIR,

"The conversation we had on Sunday morning concerning Rousseau, Voltaire, Shakspeare, &c., started an idea, as I was returning home, which I immediately put into the form you see. I would not have you suppose, sir, I mean to depreciate the talents of Voltaire; that is far from my intention; I would only vindicate oet who, of all others within my sphere of knowledge, and as my judgment extends, is infinitely the greatest. I should sent you the verses before, because I know your reverence my favourite bard *, but that I kept them to see if, after two or three nights, I still thought them fit to be read. I am in doubt; for any thing middling on such a subject is conceivable. However, I have not yet shown them to any person, but you, sir, and Mr. Bonneville, at whose lodgings they were sent.

“Clad in the wealthy robes his genius wrought,
In happy dreams was gentle Shakspeare laid;
His pleas'd soul wand'ring through the realms of thought,
While all his elves and fairies round him play'd.

Voltaire approach'd — strait fled the quaint-ey'd band,
For envy's breath such sprites may not endure:
He pilfer'd many a gem with trembling hand;
Then stabb'd the bard to make the theft secure.

Ungrateful man! Vain was thy black design:
Th' attempt and not the deed thy hand defil'd.
Preserv'd by his own charms and spells divine, Safety the gentle Shakspeare slept and smil'd.”

The conception of this little allegorical fiction is certainly a happy one, and the execution is no less spirited and elegant. In respect, however, to the enthusiasm with which Englishmen usually endeavour to persuade foreigners of the superlative excellence of our great dramatist, unless where it is taken up in self-praise, it is undoubtedly a species of quixotism, and of the most useless kind.

The remittances which Mr. Holcroft was to receive from his publisher, were not so regular as he had expected. Indeed, there seems to have been some unaccountable neglect on the part of the publisher; and Mr. Holcroft would have been reduced to very little account was at the head of that party in France, who either did or affected to admire Shakspeare.

He was not Rivington the bookseller, but John Rivington, the printer, of St. Martin's Lane, who died about the time of Mr. Holcroft's return, or (I believe) a few years before. He was one of the sons of Mr. Rivington, then bookseller of St. Paul's Church-Yard, whose other sons still carry on the business of bookselling. Mr. Rivington engaged in an agreement or adventure with Mr. Holcroft, that he should select, and translate, and publish for their joint account, he (Mr. Rivington) advancing money to Mr. Holcroft, as a loan for his expenses. The reason why he was not punctual in his remittances great distress, had it not been for the generous assistance afforded him by his friend Bonneville, who was himself in no very affluent circumstances. He was at last wearied out with the state of suspense and dependence in which he was kept; and in October he took the resolution of again returning to England. He however left his son behind him at a school in or near Paris.

Before Mr. Holcroft went from England, he had left an opera, called "The Noble Peasant," in the hands of Mr. Colman, then manager of the Haymarket theatre. This had been accepted; and such was Mr. Colman's opinion of it, that, on his return, he advanced Mr. Holcroft a hundred pounds, in the expectation of its future success. This piece was acted the ensuing season (in 1784). The evening it was acted, Mr. Holcroft had placed himself behind the scenes, as authors generally do, to watch the progress of the piece, or be of occasional assistance. At the end, however, of the first act, the effect produced on the audience seemed so discouraging, and disapprobation began to manifest itself so strongly, that Mr. Holcroft could no longer stand it. He left the theatre, quite hopeless of success, and went and walked for an hour in St. James's Park. He had by this time so far mastered the agitation of his spirits, that he returned to the Haymarket, tolerably resigned to his fate. He got in just at the conclusion of the third act, and was most agreeably surprised, when he heard the house resounding with applause, and saw himself surrounded by the actors and others, who came to congratulate him on the complete success of the piece. It, however, only ran eleven nights. It was then stopped by Mr. Colman, in consequence of a disagreement with the author, whom he had without reason suspected of writing some paragraphs in the "Morning Herald" against "The Connoisseurs." Mr. Holcroft soon after vindicated himself so fully from this charge, that Mr. Colman was satisfied.*

was, that he was much distressed for money to carry on his own extensive business of printing. John Rivington was a good-natured, worthy man, much esteemed by his friends. He died before the middle period of life, of a typhus fever, some time about the year 1785, or 1786.

* I believe it is in "The Connoisseurs" that a yawning scene was introduced by the author, who, being also the manager, found great difficulty in getting it acted to his mind. He was met one morning by Macklin, coming out from rehearsal, and looking rather discontented, the other asked what was the matter? "I can't get these fellows to yawn," was the answer. "Oh, if that's all," said Macklin, "you have only to read to them the first act of 'The Man of Business;' " a dull play of that name, by Colman.

success of this opera was not certainly equal to its merits, are considerable. It seems to have given rise to a succession of plays of the same kind, the scene of which is laid in the chivalry; and which represent the costume, characters, and manners of remote times. Such particularly have been "The Duke of Hexham," "The Mountaineers," "The Venetian Outlaw," &c. This opera is, in fact, a romance dramatised.

The story of this little piece is interesting and natural, as far as an antic story can be so. The dialogue is well supported throughout, particularly in the comic parts; and though there are many imitations of Shakspeare, both in the incidents, characters, and speeches, yet they are very happily executed, with much good fancy; which show that the author had imbibed the spirit of the poet in whose steps he treads. The songs, both the serious and the morous ones, have great merit; and were most of them set to music by Mr. Holcroft, in his preface to the opera, pays a high and deserved compliment. I should add here, for the sake of those who take an interest in dramatic retrospections, that in this opera he played Earl Egbert, and that the part of the Fool was acted by Edwin.

Holcroft's next piece came out at Covent Garden, and was "The Cholerick Fathers." This opera is inferior to the last. The scene is supposed to be in Spain, and the business of the opera turns upon the testy disposition of two fathers, who suddenly set off a match between their children, just as they are going to settle the marriage-settlement. The merit of the piece consists in the easy impudence and vivacity of a valet, who forms a series of schemes, and acts different characters, to outwit the gentlemen, and bring about a reconciliation. The plot is laid out after the manner of the Spanish school, full of intrigue and complications: these are at last overcome with a good deal of ingenuity, and the denouement is both natural and unexpected.

Holcroft had for some time been concerned in the "Wit's Magazine," for which he wrote a number of amusing articles; but he declined his share in it, seeming determined to bend his talents wholly to works of greater moment.

CHAP. IV.

IN 1784, "The Marriage of Figaro" (Mariage de Figaro), by Beaumarchais, came out at Paris, where it was acted with extraordinary success. Mr. Holcroft no sooner received notice of this piece than he formed the instant resolution of going over to France to procure a copy of it, in order to translate and adapt it to the stage.

He arrived in Paris the latter end of September, 1784, and proceeded to the lodgings of his friend Bonneville, to whom he immediately communicated the object of his journey. They talked about the accomplishment of it directly; but they found it attended with greater difficulty than they had expected. The comedy had not been printed: therefore, their first plan was to procure a manuscript copy, either at the theatre, or through some friend of the author. This attempt, however, they found fruitless, from the jealousy with which the managers of the French theatre prevent any copies from getting abroad. The only resource now remaining, was to commit it to memory; and, for this purpose, Mr. Holcroft and his friend went to the theatre every night for four or ten days successively, till they brought away the whole with perfect exactness. At night, when they got home, each of them set down as much as he could recollect of a scene, and then they compared notes; if any difficulty occurred, it was determined the following evening. Another scene was brought away for the next representation in like manner: and the entire play was at length transcribed. It was necessary to proceed in this delicate and cautious manner; as, if they had attempted to take notes of the play continued to do so more than once, their design would probably have been suspected and defeated by the interference of the managers.

Mr. Holcroft was not, it seems, quite confident of his success till he had his manuscript safely deposited in his portmanteau with which he immediately set out on his return home. The manuscript was lost, and the acquisition Mr. Holcroft had made was lost. A day after his arrival, he communicated to Mr. Harris through the medium of the Robinsons. A meeting was appointed, and it was agreed that Figaro should, with all possible expedition, make his appearance in an English dress. The necessary metamorphosis was sted in a few weeks, and Figaro was acted at Covent Garden theatre, under the title of "The Follies of a Day," a little before the Christmas holidays. The reception of the new piece was equal to the sanguine expectations Mr. Holcroft had formed, and the pains he had taken to bring it forward. It continued to be acted without intermission for a considerable length of time, and is still one of our most popular entertainments. It is needless here to give any account, or to speak of the merits of a piece so well known to the public, and for which we are indebted more to Mr. Holcroft's industry and enterprise, than to his genius as an author. It would be unjust, however, to suppose that it is a mere literal translation. Many alterations were necessary to adapt it exactly to the taste of an English audience, and these were executed with much skill and felicity. Of all the pieces brought out by the author, this and "The Road to Ruin" have been the most successful. He received six hundred pounds for it at the theatre, besides a considerable sum for the copyright, which was bought in at the time.

Mr. Holcroft himself played the part of Figaro the first night, in the absence of Mr. Bonner for whom it was designed, and who afterwards took it. Mr. Holcroft had before this given up his engagement at Drury Lane, but at what precise period I cannot tell.

The music of the only song in this piece, "Ah! well-a-day, my poor heart!" was by Shield. It became a great favourite; and Longman, coming to treat for the purchase of the music with Shield, who hesitated what price to ask, the other, half laughing, made him an offer of three and twenty dozen of wine for it; which terms were readily acceded to by Shield, it being more than he had at that time ever received for a song. Mr. Holcroft took the first opportunity of acquainting his friend Bonneville with the success of the undertaking in which he had been of such service to him. His letter is dated Dec. 28. 1784.

"DEAR BONNEVILLE,

"I am sure you will pardon my apparent neglect, when you remember how exceedingly hard I have been obliged to labour since my arrival in England. Figaro has made his appearance, and is likely to be as great a favourite in London as in Paris. I wish most sincerely you were here to be a witness of his good fortune. I enclose a letter of exchange for 480 livres, on Girard and Co., bankers, Paris. The many obligations I have to your friendship, the pleasure I take in your company, and the fear I entertain lest your very virtues should lead you into irretrievable difficulties, make me earnestly desire to see you in England. Fortune seems at present disposed to smile upon my efforts ; I only wish you were with me to participate her favours. I am sure you would be happy. Why will you not come ? Billy has written to you, as you will see ; you know he loves you, he has reason to do so ; and though a child, I hope he will not forget his obligation.* Pray do not fail to tell M. and Madame Mercier, that though I do not write, I remember them as they would wish to be remembered ; that is, I remember their virtue and their friendship, and shall do while I live."

Mr. Holcroft had about this time considerable intimacy with several French literary characters ; among others, with M. Berquin, the author of "The Children's Friend," who came over here to inspect the translation of his own work into English ; and a Mr. Floscel, an unfortunate but worthy man, whose works he recommended to the public in a circular proposal. Mr. Floscel came over to England to procure some subscriptions to a considerable literary undertaking, but was attacked by a disorder which proved fatal to him soon after his arrival.

It may be proper to add here, that Mr. Holcroft had offered "The Marriage of Figaro" to Drury Lane theatre before he left England ; but he had clogged this proposal with other conditions, which probably prevented its acceptance. This appears from a letter either to Mr. Sheridan or Mr. Linley, which may be worth insertion ; both as it contains the first hints of a project of dramatic authorship, which has, I believe, been since acted upon at the other house, and as it is characteristic of Mr. Holcroft's unwearied industry in his different undertakings, and of the sanguine temper with which he encouraged the most distant prospects of success. It is necessary to observe, in explanation of one part of the letter, that he had, while in Paris (in 1783), written a tragedy, the heroine of which he very anxiously wished to see personated by Mrs. Siddons, who was now in the height of her reputation.

" Sir,

" Not having been able to see you on the subject of the tragedy ("Ellen, or the Fatal Cave"), and being at present obliged to make a

* Mr. Holcroft, as it appears from this letter had brought his son William with him from France.

urney to Paris, I take the liberty of submitting the following proposals to your consideration. Besides the tragedy already presented, I have a comedy begun, which will be ready in a month for my return; that is, I will engage to give it in complete some time in November.

"My proposals, then, sir, are, instead of author's nights, to receive a salary, and that a very moderate one; for which, exclusive of the tragedy and comedy already mentioned, I will engage to write any recitatives, songs, or choruses, which may be wanted for pantomimes, or other temporary occasions in the theatre. The terms I require are ten pounds per week, under the following provisos. If either the tragedy or comedy are condemned by the public, I will furnish an after-piece; should two out of the three miscellany, my salary shall be reduced to seven pounds per week; and should all three be unfortunate, to five; and to be in the receipt of only five pounds per week till one has succeeded, the arrears to be then paid. By this proposal Mrs. Siddons's nights shall not be encroached upon. I, as an author, shall have the interest of the house at heart, and shall neglect no opportunity of promoting that interest:—the terms are so moderate, the probabilities I presume are greatly that the proprietors should gain, not lose. My own reputation will make me exert myself to the utmost; and with respect to my fulfilling the conditions proposed, I will enter into any forfeiture, not exceeding the receipt of my whole salary, to fulfil them literally. Indeed, whatever my talents may be, my industry and facility will not be disputed. I set off for France to-morrow morning, where, sir, there is at present a most popular piece, 'The Marriage of Figaro,' which I shall endeavour to procure; it will be to the advantage of the theatre to get first what I know is thought an object, and which, if these terms are agreeable to you, sir, and the proprietors, I shall then be more earnest and expeditious concerning. I must, however, add, I am far from being certain of obtaining it; on the contrary, I understand it will be attended with great difficulties. I must entreat, sir, that this proposal remain totally a secret if not acceded to; otherwise it might injure me: and the fear lest it might by accident become known, was the only motive that prevented me from making it sooner. Should this meet your approbation, you will greatly oblige me to signify as much as soon as possible, by sending a line directed to me at Paris."

CHAP. V.

THE comedy of "Seduction" appeared in the year 1787, and received with very great applause. Some few hints for it were taken from "Les Liaisons Dangereux ;" but it was chieflly original, and possessed great merit. In 1789, appeared the translation of the King of Prussia's works, in twelve or thirteen volumes, also the translation of the Essays of Lavater. For the first of these Mr. Holcroft received 1200*l.* from Robinsons, the book he had worked almost night and day to get it out soon, prevent the possibility of anticipation. He had, I believe, sent it early, and before the publication of the original work, procured a copy through the interest of the Prussian Ambassador. He explains, in one of his letters about this time, of the difficulty in translating the poetry of the great Frederic, for whose author, though he translated his works, seems to have had great predilection.* His translation of Lavater's smaller works certainly been the means of making the English public acquainted with the system of that ingenious and lively writer : but it was criticised with unusual severity by the authors of the "Anecdotes," and this led to some disagreeable altercation between Holcroft and the Reviewers.

In 1790, "The German Hotel" appeared at Covent Garden, which is little more than a translation from the German of Büchner. The plot is very neat and lively, and sometimes interesting, though there is very little besides plot and incident in the piece. Thorck seems the counterpart of Squire Thornhill, in the "Wife of Wakefield." The most striking circumstance in this drama is the perfect preservation of the unities of time and place. In the present instance, this peculiarity adds to the natural effect of the scene by riveting the imagination to one spot, and thus giving a sort of reality to it, and by making the incidents follow one another in such quick succession, that the mind has no time to quit

* Mr. Holcroft long projected a work, of which Frederick II. was the hero, and the subject the effects of war and despotism. He made considerable preparations for this work ; for he had completely lined a large room with books, which were to furnish the materials, direct or collateral, for his history of bad governments.

their probability. The events are some of them the most improbable that can be supposed ; yet such is the mechanical construction of the plot, that they seem inseparably interwoven with each other, and as if they could not happen otherwise. The whole play is like a scene really passing in a hall of a large Hotel, in the course of a few hours.

Mr. Holcroft brought out the comedy of the "The School for Arrogance," in the beginning of 1791. In consequence of some disagreement between Mr. Holcroft and Mr. Harris respecting former pieces, it was imagined it would not be very graciously received if the author were known ; and a friend undertook for a time to father the piece. After the comedy had been twice performed, the author wrote the following letter to the manager of the theatre. It is published in the preface.

" SIR,

" I have patiently waited the proper moment in which to write to you. That moment I hope is now come. I should be guilty of injustice, were I any longer to delay expressing my sense of the propriety with which you have acted relative to " The School for Arrogance," after you had every reason to suppose it mine. Such conduct, sir, is highly honourable ; and is not only productive of the best effects, but must secure the best and most permanent applause. That you had conceived disadvantageous ideas of me, I knew ; though I have no doubt, but I shall ultimately convince you, that, even supposing me to be mistaken, my motives have been laudable. With me you were irritated ; but you had the justice to forget the man, and promote the interests of the piece. This I hold it my duty to say to the world at large.

" I am, sir," &c.

" The School for Arrogance" is, in its plan, founded on " Le Glorieux," of Destouches, but it is for the most part original. It is Mr. Holcroft's best play, with the exception of " The Road to Rain," and perhaps even this exception is doubtful. The last of these pieces is, no doubt, much more adapted for stage effect ; but I question whether the former would not be perused oftener, and with greater delight, in the closet. It is less eventful, less interesting, less showy and dazzling ; but it has beauties more refined in the conception and difficult in the execution. Such is the whole of the character of Count Conolly Villars, which is managed throughout with the nicest art. His pride of birth; the conflict between the feelings of love and a sense of the honour of his family; and the rapid and delicate alternations of passion, arising from a constant fear of degrading himself, either by resisting, or indulging the familiarity of others, are described without the violation of truth, perhaps, in a single instance. On the other hand, the contrast between the pride of wealth and that of ancestry, which the character of Lady Peckham gives the author an opportunity to display, has an effect equally forcible, whether we regard the immediate impression on the audience, or the moral lesson it conveys. The other characters are comparatively insignificant, though necessary and well supported. To expose the weaknesses of pride, as it is founded on the prejudice either of wealth or ancestry, may be said to form the whole business of the piece. This however is not done by pompous, laboured declamation, or satirical epigrams; but by showing the effects of these prejudices on real characters, and in natural situations. As this play is less known than some of Mr. Holcroft's other plays, we shall select the following scene for the entertainment of the reader: —

“ Enter COUNT, bowing.

Lady Peckham. So, sir! They tells me, sir, that you and my foolish husband are colloquing together, for to marry my daughter! Is this troo, sir?

Count (with his usual polite haughtiness). If it were, ma'am?

Lady P. Do you know who Miss Loocy Peckham is, sir?

Count. Not very well, ma'am.

Lady P. Sir?

Count. Except that she is your daughter.

Lady P. And do you know who I am, sir?

Count. I have been told, ma'am.

Lady P. Told, sir! Told! What have you been told? What have you been told, sir?

Count. That your ladyship was an honest wax-chandler's daughter.

Lady P. Yes, sir! The debbidity of his vard, sir! A common councilman, and city sword-bearer! Had an alderman's gownd von year, vus chosen sheriff the next, and died a lord-mayor elect!

Count. With all his honours blooming on his brow!

Lady P. And do you know, sir, that I designs Sir Samooel Sheepy, sir, an English knight and barrow knight, for the spouse of my daughter! A gentleman that is a gentleman! A person of honour and purtensions, and not a papish Jesubite.

Count. Of his honours and pretensions I have yet to be informed, madam.

Lady P. Vhat, sir! do you mean for to say, sir, or to insinivate, sir, that Sir Samooel Sheepy is not your betters?

Count. If Sir Samuel himself, madam, had put such a question to me, I would have replied with my sword, or, more properly, with my cane.

Lady P. Wery well, sir! I'll let Sir Samooel know that you threatens to cane him; I'll take care to report you! Cane quotha! He shall talk to you.

Count. Let him, madam.

Lady P. Madam! Madam! At every vord;—pray, sir, do you know that Sir Paul Peckham has had the honour to be knighted by the king's own hand?

Count. I have heard as much, madam.

Lady P. Madam, indeed!—And for you for to think for to look up to my daughter!

Count. Up, madam!

Lady P. Yes, sir—up, sir!—Pray, sir, vhat are your purtensions?

Count. (with great agitation) Madam!

Lady P. Who are you, sir? Where do you come from? Who knows you? Vhat parish do you belong to?

Count. Madam, I am of a family known to history, known to Europe, known to the whole universe!

Lady P. Ah! I believes you are better known than trusted.

Count. The names of Conolly and Villars, madam, never before were so degraded as they have been in my person.

Lady P. Oh! I makes no doubt but you are a person that would legurade any name!

Count. Insult like what I have received from you, madam, no man should utter and escape death—but you are—

Lady P. Vhat, sir? Vhat am I, sir?

Count. A woman.

Lady P. A woman, indeed! Sir, I would have you to know as how I am a lady! A lady, sir, of his majesty's own making!

And moreover, sir, don't you go for to flatter yourself that bestow the hand and fortin of Miss Loocy Peckham upon an outlandish Count somebody nobody! My daughter, sir, is f better!

Count. Madam, though scurril—[Recollecting himself madam, though such vul—, such accusations are ben answer, yet I must tell you that by marrying your daug after this I should sink myself so low—I say, by marryin daughter, madam, I should confer an honour on your far much superior to its expectations, as the splendour of the sun is to the twinkling of the worthless glow-worm!

Lady P. What! What! [Enter Edmund, son of Lady ham.] Marry come up! An Irish French foriner! Not as von of our parish porpers! And you! You purtend to c yourself to the united houses of the Peckhams and the P Your family indeed! Yourn! Where's your settlement? Vus'nt my great uncle, Mr. Peter Pringle, the cheesemo Cateaton-street, a major in the train-bands before you vus I thought of?

Edmund. [Aside] So, so! I'm too late! [Aloud] I entreat your ladyship—

Lady P. What! Has'nt I an ownd sister at this day ma Mr. Poladore Spraggs, the tip-toppest hot-presser in all C Friars! Isn't my maiden aunt, Miss Angelica Pringle thirty thousand pounds, in the South Sea funds, every n she rises! And doesn't I myself get up and go to bed, the lady in this here city! And for to purtend for to talk to his family! His'n.

Edmund. The Count, madam, is a man of the first dis in his native country!

Lady P. What country is that, sir? Who ever heard country but England? A count among beggars! How his countship worth?

Count. I had determin'd to be silent, madam, but I find possible! [With vehement volubility.] And I must inform y family is as ancient, as exalted, and as renowned, as y proved yours to be—what I shall not repeat! That I heir to more rich acres than I believe your ladyship ev over! That my father's vassals are more numerous tha ladyship's vaunted guineas! That the magnificence in w has lived, looked with contempt on the petty, paltry strainings of a trader's pride! And that in his hall are daily fed — [Stops short, and betrays a consciousness of inadvertent falsehood, but suddenly continues with increasing vehemence] Yes, madam, are daily fed, now, at this moment, madam, more faithful adherents, with their menials and followers, than all your boasted wealth could for a single year supply!

Edmund. Are? At this moment, say you, count?

Count. Sir, I—I have said.

Edmund. I know you to be a man of honour, and that you cannot say what is not.

Count. I—I—I have said, sir! [Walking with great perturbation.]

Lady P. You have said more in a minute than you can prove in a year!

Edmund. I will pledge my word for the count's veracity.

Count. [Aside] What have I done! [With agony] A lie!

Lady P. As for you, sir, I doesn't believe von vord you say! I knows the tricks of such sham chevaliers as you, too vell!

Count. [Walking away from her] Torture!

Lady P. But I'll take care to have you prognosticated.

Count. [Aside] I can support it no longer. [Going.]

Edmund. [Catching him by the hand] My dear count —

Count. Sir, I am a dishonoured villain! [Exit.]

Lady P. There! There! he tells you himself he is a willin? his conscience flies in his face, and he owns it!

Edmund. [With great ardour and feeling] Madam, he is a noble-hearted gentleman! His agonizing mind deems it villany to suffer insults so gross. [Exit.]

Re-enter the COUNT, deep in thought, and much agitated.

Lady P. [Seeing him] Marry my daughter, indeed! — Faugh! [Exit Lady Peckham.]

Count. Into what has my impetuous anger hurried me? — Guilty of falsehood! I? To recede is impossible! What! Stand detected before this city madam! — whose tongue, itching with the very scrofula of pride, would iterate liar in my ear! No! Falsehood itself is not so foul." — ACT III.

This is truth and nature. If it should be thought that the description of Lady Peckham borders too much on caricature, it should be remembered that grossness is the essence of the character, and it serves to set off more forcibly the refinement of Count. If, however, it should be insisted that the scene which has been transcribed is a union of farce and sentimental comedy, still it is farce worthy of Foote, and the serious part is worthy of any one.

The sentiments which are inculcated in the scene which precedes the one just quoted, are such as have never been embodied with the prejudices of any class of men, because it must be confessed they are much more adapted to convince the reason than flatter the passions or the imagination! Lucy Peckham is a female philosopher, and lectures the count on his pretensions in a manner scarcely less grating to his feelings than the personalities of his mother. The count says, "Mankind have agreed, madam, to honour the descendants of the wise and the brave." To this his mistress replies, "They have so; but you have, doubtless, too much native merit to arrogate to yourself the worth of others. You are no jay, decked in the peacock's feathers! You are no idiot enough to imagine that a skin of parchment, on which is emblazoned the arms and the acts of one wise man, with a long list of succeeding fools, is any honour to you! Responsible to mankind for the use and the abuse of such talents as you feel yourself endowed with, you ought to think only how you may deserve greatly; and disdain to be that secondary thing, that insignificant cypher, which is worthless, except from situation!"

Whatever may be thought of the political tendency of this speech, the morality of it is unquestionable; and though it may not be practicable for society at large to act upon the standard here proposed, yet surely every individual would do well to apply it to his own conduct, and to the value which he sets upon himself and his own private esteem. However necessary it may be that the vulgar should respect rank for its own sake, it is desirable that the great themselves should respect virtue more, and endeavour to make the theory, on which nobility is founded, correspond with the practice — private worth with public esteem. The sentiments of this kind, which Mr. Holcroft has interspersed through his different works, may therefore remain as useful moral lessons, notwithstanding their noxious political qualities, if ever they had such, have long since evaporated; though I shall take an opportunity to show that Mr. Holcroft's politics were never any thing more than an enlarg-system of morality, growing out of just sentiments and general improvement.

"The School for Arrogance" is the first of the author's pieces in which there appeared a marked tendency to political or philosophical speculation. Sentiments of this kind, however, and at that time, would rather have increased than diminished the popularity of any piece. A proof of this is, that the very epilogue (which is seldom designed to give offence) glances that way.

"Such is the modern man of high-flown fashion!
Such are the scions sprung from Runny-Mede!
The richest soil that bears the rankest weed!
Potato-like, the sprouts are worthless found;
And all that's good of them is under ground."

The wit and point of this satire will not be disputed.

Mr. Holcroft's next play was "The Road to Ruin," which carried his fame as a dramatic writer into every corner of the kingdom where there was a play-house. Nothing could exceed the effect produced by this play at its first appearance, nor its subsequent popularity. It not only became a universal favourite, but it deserved to be so. Mr. Holcroft, in sending round one or two copies of it to his friends before it was acted, had spoken of it as his best performance. He had hitherto been generally dissatisfied with what he had written, as not answering his own wishes, or what he thought himself capable of producing: but in this instance he seems to have thought his muse had been as favourable to him as she was likely to be. Authors are perhaps seldom deceived with respect to their works, when they judge of them from their own immediate feelings, and not out of contradiction to the opinions of others, or from a desire to excel in something which the world thinks them incapable of. Mr. Holcroft's predictions were at least verified by the appearance of "The Road to Ruin." It had a run greater than almost any other piece was ever known to have, and there is scarcely a theatre in the kingdom, except Drury Lane* and the Haymarket, in which it has not been acted numberless times. The profits he received from it were 900*l.* from Mr. Harris, and 300*l.* or 400*l.* for the copyright.

"The Road to Ruin" is so well known to the public, and its merits have been so fully established, that it seems almost impertinent to make any remarks upon it: yet, as it is Mr. Holcroft's greatest dramatic effort, it might be thought wrong to pass it over without attempting to point out its leading features, or ascertain its rank among similar productions.

* It has since been repeatedly acted in both of these theatres.

The character of Goldfinch, though not the principal character was undoubtedly that which contributed most to the popularity of the piece. Nine persons out of ten who went to see "The Rose to Ruin," went for the sake of seeing Goldfinch, though the best parts of the play are those in which he has no concern. The very great effect it produced was, in some measure, owing to the admirable acting of Lewis. But there are other circumstances which would almost be sure to make it the favourite of the public. In the first place, it is a most masterly delineation of the character pretends to describe, namely, that of a person of very little understanding, but with very great animal spirits, in the height of youth and thoughtlessness, and who is hurried away by all the vulgar dissipation of fashionable life. There is not the smallest glimmering of wit or sense in all that Goldfinch says, yet nothing can exceed the life, the spirit, the extreme volubility, the restless animation, which Mr. Holcroft has thrown into this character. He has none but the most mean and grovelling ideas; his language consists entirely of a few cant words; yet the rapidity with which he glances from object to object, and the evident delight which he takes in introducing his favourite phrases on all occasions, has all the effect of the most brilliant wit. That's your sort comes at least fifty times, and is just as unexpected and lively the last time as the first, for no other reason than because Goldfinch has just the same pleasure in repeating it. This mechanical humour was so much the more striking in its effect, because every person could make it his own. It was a very transferable, and therefore a very convenient, commodity. It was a compendious receipt for being witty, to go and see Goldfinch, and repeat after him, That's your sort. If the invention was not favourable to the increase, it was at least calculated for the spread of wit. Mr. Holcroft may some sort be considered as the author of this species of dramatic humour, of which succeeding writers have fully availed themselves, and on which the effect of many of our most popular modern pieces depends. Cant terms have, it is true, always been the subject of ridicule on the stage; but Mr. Holcroft was the first who made them interesting, or who conceived the project of giving spirit and animation to a character by the use single phrase. The two most important characters in the play are those of old Dornton and his son ; the former, an eminent lawyer in the city, the latter, a wild, but high-minded and noble-minded young man, something like Charles, in "The School for Adultery." The serious interest of the piece arises chiefly from the struggle between prudence and affection in the mind of the father, from the compunction and generous sacrifices of the youth to save his father's house from the ruin which he believes he has brought upon it. He is in love with Sophia, the daughter of the late Mr. Warren. This last lady is described with a person and an equally unprepossessing. She is, however, supposed to be virtuous, and is violently in love with young Dornton, who determines, rather than see his father ruined, to marry her, and forsake his noble and guileless Sophia. This match is prevented by the violent interference of old Dornton.

Mr. Sulky and Mr. Silky are two very principal characters in the play, whose names are happily adapted to their characters ; the former being as remarkable for a blunt kind of surly honesty, as the latter is for smooth, sleek, fawning knavery. It is, however, on the confusion of these two names, that the contrivance of the plot depends. For the late Mr. Warren, not being well pleased with the conduct of his wife, and suspecting her violent professions of affection, determination not to marry again, had made a will, in which, in the event of such an event should happen, he had left his property to his natural son, Milford, and to his wife's daughter, appointing Mr. Sulky his executor. He died abroad, and the person who brought the will, being deceived by the name, leaves it in the possession of Mr. Silky, instead of Mr. Sulky. Mr. Silky, knowing the widow's amorous propensities, and willing to profit by them, in the person of Goldfinch, who is besieging her for her money, that he has secured in his possession which puts the widow's fortune, should she marry again, entirely in his power ; and exacts a promise from him to pay fifty thousand pounds out of a hundred and fifty, as the price of his secrecy, with respect to himself. He then calls on the widow, shows her the conditions of the will, and threatens to make it null unless she marries Goldfinch, and assents to his proposal. She, however, governed by her passion for young Dornton, and relying on the exhaustless wealth of his family, sets Mr. Silky and Goldfinch at defiance, and, on his next visit, treats Mr. Goldfinch with a very little ceremony. But after she finds herself disappointed of Dornton, and is in the height of her exclamations a whole sex, Goldfinch is announced. His name at this moment has the effect of suddenly calming her spirits; he is admitted with much affected modesty; he makes another offer; it is struck; Mr. Silky is sent for, and Goldfinch sets off for a licence. But just as he is going out, he meets Milford being more fool than knave, he tells the latter of his marriage of the hush-money to Silky, on account of some deed, by which he has the widow's fortune at his command, though he does not know how. This excites suspicion in the mind of Milford, supposing it must be his father's will, goes immediately to inform him of the circumstance, and they conceal then the widow's apartment. Goldfinch, Silky, and the widow after come in; every thing is settled, and the will is on the point of being committed to the flames, when Milford and Silky upon them, and their whole scheme is unluckily defeated.

This sketch may be sufficient to give an idea of the scene, and the rapidity with which events follow on. The story never stagnates for a moment: the whole is crowded, and the wonder seems to be how so many incidents regularly connected, and so clearly explained, can be brought together in so small a compass. At the same time, the events, and the intricacy of the plot, do not interfere with the folding of the characters, or the forcible expression of the passions. Some of the scenes are replete with the truest pathos expressed without exaggeration, or the least appearance of art. Though the feelings of paternal affection, of terror, and of love, are often wrought up to the highest pitch, and described in their full force, so that the reader finds nothing wanting in language so easy and natural, that not only might it be used by the persons themselves, but they could scarcely use any other.

Mrs. Holcroft died in the year 1790.

It was in the preceding year that Mr. Holcroft met the severest blow that fortune had yet inflicted on him — the death of his son. This unhappy event has been sometimes misrepresented by persons unacquainted with the character and feelings of Mr. Holcroft: the best answer to these misrepresentations is to state the circumstances as they happened, without any comment.

William Holcroft was his only son, and favourite child.

very circumstance perhaps led to the catastrophe which had nearly proved fatal to his father as well as to himself. He had been brought up, if any thing, with too much care and tenderness. The greatest attention had been paid to his education from the very first, not only by teaching him to read and write, French, English, &c., but by daily instilling such moral principles into his mind, as it was Mr. Holcroft's earnest wish and firm belief would in the end make him a great and good man. Perhaps it was a mistake to suppose that precept could anticipate the fruits of experience, or that it was not a dangerous experiment to enable a child to think and reason for himself on the propriety of his own actions, before settled habits and a knowledge of consequences had provided a sufficient counterpoise to the levity of youth, and the caprices of fancy. Be this as it may, he was a boy of extraordinary capacity, and Mr. Holcroft thought no pains should be spared for his instruction and improvement. From the first, however, he had shown an unsettled disposition; and his propensity to ramble was such from his childhood, that when he was only four years old, and under the care of an aunt at Nottingham, he wandered away to a place at some distance, where there was a coffee-house, into which he went, and read the newspapers to the company, by whom he was taken care of and sent home. This propensity was so strong in him, that it became habitual, and he had run away six or seven times before the last. Once, for instance, in 1786, when he was about thirteen, he had taken a little mare which belonged to his father, and went to Northampton, where he was discovered by some respectable persons in the place, and word being sent to Mr. Holcroft, he went down, and brought him home with him. On Sunday, November 8. 1789, he brought his father a short poem; a watch, which had been promised as a reward, was given him; his father conversed with him in the most affectionate manner, praised, encouraged, and told him, that notwithstanding his former errors and wanderings, he was convinced he would become a good and excellent man. But he observed, when taking him by the hand to express his kindness, that the hand of the youth, instead of returning the pressure as usual, remained cold and insensible. This, however, at the moment was supposed to be accidental. He seemed unembarrassed, cheerful, and asked leave, without any appearance of design or hesitation, to dine with a friend in the city, which was immediately granted. He thanked his father, went down stairs, and several times anxiously inquired whether his father were got to dress. As soon as he was told that he had left his room, he went up stairs again, broke open a drawer, and took out forty pounds. With this, the watch, a pocket-book, and a pair of pistols of his father's, he hastened away to join one of his acquaintances, who was going to the West Indies. The name of this young person was G——. He was immediately pursued to Gravesend, but in vain. It was not discovered till the following Wednesday that he had taken the money. After several days of the most distressing inquietude, there appeared strong presumptive proofs that he, with his acquaintance, was on board the "Fame," Captain Carr, then lying in the Downs. The father and a friend immediately set off, and travelled post all Sunday night to Deal. The information proved true, for he was found to be on board the "Fame," where he assumed a false name, though his true situation was known to the captain. He had spent all the money, except 15*l.*, in paying for his passage, and purchasing what he thought he wanted. He had declared he would shoot any person who came to take him, but that if his father came, he would shoot himself. His youth, for he was but sixteen, made the threat appear incredible. The pistols, pocket-book, and remaining money were locked up for his safety by his acquaintance. But he had another pair of pistols concealed. Mr. Holcroft and his friend went on board and made inquiries, and understood he was there. He had retired in a dark part of the steerage. When he was called and did not answer, a light was sent for, and as he heard the ship's steward call some of the sailors, and his father approaching, conscious of what he had done, and unable to bear the presence of his father, and to open shame of detection, he suddenly put an end to his existence.

The shock which Mr. Holcroft received was almost mortal. For three days he could not see his own family, and nothing but the love he bore that family could probably have prevented him from sinking under his affliction. He seldom went out of his house for a whole year afterwards : and the impression was never completely effaced from his mind.

BOOK IV.

CHAPTER I.

MR. HOLCROFT had been, for some years, imbibing principles, and forming a system in his mind, relative to political and moral questions, considerably different from those which are generally received, or at least acted upon, by the world.

The interest which he felt in the success of these speculations, will be best expressed by extracting some part of a letter to a friend, written in February, 1790. He says, "The great object I have in view is, not the obtaining of riches, but the power of employing my time according to the bent of my genius, in the performance of some works which shall remain when I am no more — works that will promote the general good. This is a purpose I have so strongly at heart, that I would with pleasure sacrifice ease, peace, health, and life for its accomplishment: nay, accomplish it I will, unless cut off in the midst of my labours. It has been my pursuit for years, and you are my witness, I have never relaxed, never been discouraged by disappointment, to which indeed I hold men of real strength of mind to be superior." A clearer picture cannot be given of the motives from which the writer appears to have engaged in and prosecuted his task — the regard of good men hereafter, and a wish to promote the general welfare of mankind, by diffusing a system of more just and enlightened principles of action.

These rational and worthy motives are those which actuated Mr. Holcroft's whole conduct in the part he took in such questions: they are the only ones which he had at heart, and he never seems in a single instance to have wavered in his pursuit, by flattering the prejudices or soothing the vices of any set of men, by cajoling or inflaming the multitude, or by adapting his views or language to those of the ignorant, the rash, or profligate. He was a man of too honest and of too independent a turn of mind to be a time-server, to lend himself as a tool to the violence of any party; his habits and studies rendered him equally averse to political intrigues or popular tumults; and he had no other desire than to speak the truth, such as he saw it, with a conviction that its effect would be beneficial to society. Whether his opinions were right is another question : I speak here of his intentions. By anticipating the subject ; and also deviating from my plan, was not to write a panegyric, but a history.

"Anna St. Ives," a novel in seven volumes, appeared in 1790. It was much read at the time, and excited considerable notice both from the force with which it is written, and from the regularity of the characters and sentiments. As a mere story, it is interesting, lively, and vigorous. The natural or real characters are exhibited with great truth of conception, strong and vivid colouring, and often with a great deal of eccentricity. The characters both of the proud, daring, revengeful, capricious Coke Clifton, and of the sly, sinuating, cool, plodding, immoveable Abimelech Henley, are master-pieces. The invention of either of these characters stamps the author a man of genius. With respect to the execution, the invention is beyond all praise. In Richardson : Coke Clifton and Lovelace are the same ; in fact are often placed in situations so similar, that the resemblance must strike the most cursory reader. Notwithstanding this, too much praise can hardly be given to Mr. Henley's life, the enthusiasm, and glowing fancy with which he has drawn this character, and applied it to a different purpose. Abimelech, he is all his own ; and he is a person of such ill-sorted qualities, his humility and his insolence artfully jumbled together, his knavery is so artfully disguised, easily seen through, and he delivers all his purposes in a strange jargon of cant terms and phrases, every one of some end, though their connection is scarcely intelligible ; there is such a perfect consistence given to the most shapeless mass, and this in a manner so unlike any thing else, it seems almost equal to the invention of a new language for a class of men who get introduced into gentlemen's families by plodding, hoarding, fawning, and flattering the foolish masters, make fortunes themselves, ruin, and then their employers, were never better represented than in the character of Mr. Abimelech Henley. The steward in "Castle Richmond" is not so very a knave by half. The character of the Beau noir, though short, is managed with a great deal and feeling. Mac Fane, the keeper of the mad-house, &c. a strong and real portraits.

But the principal characters in the novel (at least, those which were intended by the author to be the most prominent), are no natural, but ideal beings. In fact, they are not so properly characters (that is, distinct individuals) as the vehicles of certain general sentiments, or machines put into action, as an experiment to show how these general principles would operate in particular situations. Frank Henley, and Anna St. Ives, are the philosophical hero and heroine of the work. They are the organs through which the voice of truth and reason is to breathe, and whose every action is to be inspired by the pure love of justice. Mr. Holcroft, by embodying his general principles in individual characters, no doubt gained some advantages which he could not otherwise have done; such as showing the possibility of his plan, by actually reducing it to practice, and also pointing out how persons convinced of the truths he wishes to impress, both may and ought to act in the present state of society. For instance, duelling is held to be criminal; and to show that declining a duel is no proof of cowardice, Frank Henley, who receives a blow from Coke Clifton, will not fight with him, but the very next day leaps into the water after him, and saves his life at the imminent hazard of his own: thus by an act of true heroism rising superior to the prejudices of false honour.

But though the author has gained in point of argument by throwing his reasonings into a narrative form, perhaps he has lost point of the general impression produced upon the mind. It was Mr. Holcroft's business to make his characters not only consistent, but interesting and amiable: and he has done nearly all that was possible to accomplish this end. But it seems as if the difficulty of the undertaking, from the very nature of it, was too great to be overcome. For, in spite of all the appeals that are made to reason, and though we strive ever so much to suspend our idiotic prepossessions, yet the old adage of "A faultless master, which the world ne'er saw," continually obtrudes itself upon us, and poisons our satisfaction. It is true, our dislike may be rational, but still it is dislike. That which, if left in generals, we might believe and admire, if brought to a nearer view, and exhibited in all its circumstances of improbability, we begin to detest, and for that reason to hate: quod sic mihi ostendis, incre- dulus odi. Perfect virtue; the pure disinterested love, an unshaken zeal for truth, regardless of all petty considerations, a superiority to false modesty; a contempt for the opinion of the world, when reason and conscience are on our side, — a fine things, and easily conceived, while they remain, are, the pure creatures of the understanding, mere essences, which cannot kindle too warm a glow of emotion in the breast. But when these airy nothings are made real, assume a local habitation and a name, called Frank, when they are personified in the son of a knavish steward, daughter of a foolish baronet; when they are petticoated and spurred; when they are mounted on horseback, or selves in a post-chaise, or walk arm in arm through the London or Paris, — the naked form of truth vanishes under this pitiful drapery, and the mind is distracted with contradictory appearances, which it knows not how to judge. When familiarised to us by being brought on the real stage, and ascribed to any supposed characters, perfect virtue is little better than a cheat, and the pretension to superiority looks like affectation, conceit, and pedantry. This effect some measure take place, even though the most perfect conduct and propriety were preserved: how much more then, when the mind eagerly catches hold of every little flaw, to prove the whole is a piece of acting, and to revert to its habitual nature and probability? It is not difficult to pervert the passions, so as to render them natural: that is a language men readily understand. But of the difficulty of exhibiting passions entirely under the control of reason, of virtue, or any other abstract principle, let those judge who have read the romances of Richardson. To have made Clarissa a model character, with all her studied attention to prudence, propriety, the greatest proof of his genius: yet even she is not free from affectation. In Sir Charles Grandison, he has completely has exhibited him either as an automaton, a puppet, or a placent coxcomb, “ugly all over with affectation,” whose affectation, propriety of conduct, and fine qualities, are no moment out of his sight. Rousseau’s Julia, again, is so much a pedant, and cold, calculating, and insincere. I mention these instances to show, that though I do not think Mr. Hume rendered his hero and heroine so attractive as he himself

hey might be made, yet it was not for want of genius, the impossibility of the undertaking. Frank Henley, much nobler-minded being than Sir Charles Grandison, is in general in the same predicament. We admire him, but we do not love the man: his motives we respect, but his feelings we have little sympathy. Indeed, he is a character who does not stand in need of our sympathy; "A reasoning, consistent thing; an intellectual all in all." He is himself without passions; and, in order to feel with him, we must be divested of passion.

He made these remarks to show the difficulty of embodying a philosophic character in a dramatic form.

Ignorance of truth is in some measure necessarily lowered before us "in so questionable a shape;" and nothing but a powerful mind can prevent it from becoming quite ridiculous and empty. Mr. Holcroft himself was perfectly aware of the difficulties he had to encounter, in order to exhibit his character as not to be misunderstood. He has not, indeed, been the subject of the most pointed raillery upon the philosophic pretensions of Frank Henley, in the letters of his rival, Coke Clifton. The best proof of the strength with which he has conceived and acted his favourite character is, that, notwithstanding all his wit and eloquence, Frank is never once degraded in our estimation. He stands his ground firmly, and, upon the whole, has a preference; though it is not exactly such a preference as might be thought to have over vice, wisdom over folly, or pure mind over sensuality and selfishness. An extract from one of Clifton's letters, in which he describes Frank Henley, will give a tolerable idea of the characters of both.

Frank Henley has some parts, some ideas: at least, he has plenty.

But his arrogance is insufferable. He does not scruple to show his superiority in the discourse, either with me, Sir Arthur, or the Countess of Anna! Nay, sets up for a reformer; and pretends to an superiority of understanding and wisdom. Yet he was long from home before in his life; has seen nothing, but a few books, and has been permitted to converse with this ignorant deity.

I cannot deny but that the pedagogue sometimes surprises me with the novelty of his opinions; but they are extravagant. I have descended, oftener than became me, to show how full of hyperbole and paradox they were. Still he has constantly maintained them, with a kind of congruity that astonished me, and rendered many of them plausible.

"But, exclusive of his obstinacy, the rude pot-comparaliquacity of the fellow is highly offensive. He has no sense of inferiority. He stands as erect, and speaks with as little embarrassment, and as loudly as the best of us; nay, boldly asserts, that neither riches, rank, nor birth have any claim. I have offered him a beard, if he would but turn heathen philosopher. He has several times, indeed, bestowed no small portion of ridicule upon him; but in vain. His retorts are always ready; and his impertinence, in this kind of impertinence, is unexampled.

"From some anecdotes which are told of him, I find he is without personal courage; but he has no claim to chastisement from a gentleman. Petty insults he disregards; and has several times put me almost beyond my forbearance by his cool and cutting replies. His oratory is always ready; cut, dry, and fit for use; and damned insolent oratory it frequently is.

"The absurdity of his tenets can only be equalled by the effrontery with which they are maintained. Among the most ridiculous of what he calls first principles, is that of the equality of mankind. He is one of your levellers! Marry! His superiority. Who is he? On what proud eminence can he be found? On some Welsh mountain, or the peak of Teneriffe? Certainly not in any of the nether regions. Dispute his prerogative who dares. He derives from Adam; what time the world was all "hail fellow, well met!" The savage, the wild man of the woods, is his tributary liberty-boy; and the ourang-outang, his first cousin. A lord is merry-andrew, a duke a jack-pudding, and a king a tom-fool: his name is man!

"Then, as to property, 'tis a tragic farce; 'tis his sovereign's pleasure to eat nectarines, grow them who will. Another Alexander he; the world is all his own! Aye, and he will govern it as he best knows how. He will legislate, dictate, dogmatise, for so infallible? Cannot Goliath crack a walnut?

"As for arguments, it is but ask and have: a peck at a bidding and a good double handful over. I own I thought I knew something; but no, I must to my horn-book. Then, for a simile, it is sacrilege; and must be kicked out of the high court of logic! Sacrament, too, is an ignoramus, and cannot solve a problem; wit a peck happy, who can only flash and bounce. The heavy walls of wisdom are not to be battered down with such popguns and pellets. He will waste you wind enough to set up twenty millers, in proving an apple is not an egg-shell; and that homo is Greek for a goose. Duns Scotus was a schoolboy to him. I confess he has more than once dumb-founded me with his subtleties. But, pshaw! it is a mortal waste of words and time to bestow them on him." Vol. ii.

With respect to Mr. Holcroft's principles as they are delivered in "Anna St. Ives," I shall here attempt to give a short sketch of them, of the train of events in which they originated, and of the seductiveness of the prospects which they held out to a mind not perfectly callous to the interests of humanity. Even could it be shown that they were disgraceful to his penetration, yet they were certainly honourable to his heart, and they were highly honourable to human nature. It is indeed a little singular, that those who have argued most highly of the powers of our nature, and have entertained the most sanguine hopes of the future virtue and happiness of man, should so often have been considered as the worst enemies of society. But it seems that our self-love is not so much flattered by the idea of the progress we might hereafter make, as offended by that of the little we have already made. Reformers imprudently compliment mankind on what they might become, at the expense of what they are.

Mr. Holcroft was a purely speculative politician. He constantly deprecated force, rashness, tumult, and popular violence. He was a friend to political and moral improvement, but he wished it to be gradual, calm, and rational, because he believed no other could be effectual. All sanguinary measures, all party virulence, all provocation and invective, he deplored: all that he wished was the free and dispassionate discussion of the great principles relating to human happiness, trusting to the power of reason to make itself heard, and not doubting but that the result would be favourable to freedom and virtue. He believed that truth had a natural superiority over error if it could only be heard; that if once discovered, it must, being left to itself, soon spread and triumph; and that the art of printing would not only accelerate this effect, but would prevent those accidents which had rendered the moral and intellectual progress of mankind hitherto so slow, irregular, and uncertain.

This opinion of the progress of truth and its power to crush error, had been gaining ground in this country ever since the Reformation; the immense improvements in natural and mechanical knowledge within the last century had made it appear nearly impossible to limit the discoveries of art and science; as great a revolution (and it was generally supposed as great improvements) had taken place in the theory of the human mind in consequence of the publication of Mr. Locke's Essay; and men's attention having been lately forcibly called to many of the evils and abuses existing in society, it seemed as if the present was the era of moral and political improvement, and that as bold discoveries and as large advances towards perfection would shortly be made in these as had been already made in other subjects. That this inference was profound or just, I do not affirm; but it was natural, and strengthened not only by the hopes of the good, but by the sentiments of the most thinking men.

As far as any practical experiment had been tried, the result was not discouraging. Of two revolutions that had taken place, one, that of America, had succeeded, and a more free and equal government had been established without tumult, civil discord, animosity, or bloodshed, except what had arisen from the interference of the mother country. The other revolution, that of France, was but begun; but it had at this time displayed none of those alarming features which it afterwards discovered. Whether the difference of the result in the latter case was owing to the external situation of the country, which exposed it to the inroads of a band of despots, or to the manners of the people, which had been depraved by a long course of slavery, which, while it made freedom the more desirable, rendered them the more incapable of it; whether, I say, the French Revolution might not have succeeded, had not every means been employed to destroy and crush the good that might have been expected from it, is a question not to be discussed here; but at the period of which I am speaking, believe I may say there were few real friends of liberty who did not augur well of it. A tyranny which all our most esteemed writers had been endeavouring for the last hundred years to render odious and contemptible to the English people, had been overthrown; and this was hailed by all those who had been taught to value the principles of liberty, or the welfare of nations, as an event auspicious to France and to the world. The emancipation of thirty millions of people (so I remember it was considered at the time) was a change for the better, as great as it was unexpected: the pillars of oppression and tyranny seemed to have been overthrown: man was about to shake off the fetters which had bound him in wretchedness and ignorance; and the blessings that were yet in store for him were unforeseen and incalculable. Hope smiled upon him, and pointed to futurity.

With these feelings, and with these encouragements from the state of the public mind, reasoning men began to inquire what would be the ruling principles of action in a state of society as perfect as we can suppose, or the general diffusion of which would soonest lead to such a state of improvement. And the answer was found, not so much in any real novelties, or heretofore unheard-of paradoxes, as in the most pure and simple principles of morality, differing from the common and received ones no otherwise than in the severity with which they are insisted on, and in their application to a state of things in which the same indulgences, precautions, and modifications of our higher and paramount obligations, which are at present inseparable from the imperfection of our nature, would no longer be necessary. The whole of the modern philosophy (as far as relates to moral conduct) is nothing more than a literal, rigid, unaccommodating, and systematic interpretation of the text (which is itself pretty old and good authority), "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," without making any allowances for the weaknesses of mankind, or the degree to which this rule was practicable; and the answer to the question, "Who is our neighbour?" is the same, both in the sacred records, and in the modern paraphrase, "He who most wants our assistance." I have mentioned this coincidence (I hope without offence), to show that the shock occasioned by the extreme and naked manner of representing the doctrine of universal benevolence, did not, and could not, arise from the principle itself, but from the supposition that this comprehensive and sublime principle was of itself sufficient to regulate the actions of men, without the aid of those common affections and mixed motives which our habits, passions, and vices, had taught us to regard as the highest practicable point of virtue. If, however, it be granted, not only that it is in itself right and best, but that a period might come in which it would be possible for men to be actuated by the sole principles of truth and justice, then it would seem to follow that the subordinate and auxiliary rules of action might be dispensed with, being superseded by the sense of higher and more important duties.

Mr. Holcroft was among the foremost and most ardent of those who indulged their imaginations in contemplating such an Utopian or ideal state of society, and in reasoning on the manner in which the great leading principle of morality would then be reduced to practice. In such a state of things, he believed that wars, bloodshed, and national animosities, would cease; that peace and goodwill would reign among men; and that the feeling of patriotism necessary as it now is to preserve the independence of states, would repel the ravages of unprincipled and ambitious invaders, would die away of itself with national jealousies and antipathies, with ambition, war, and foreign conquest. Family attachments would also be weakened or lost in the general principle of benevolence when every man would be a brother. Exclusive friendships could no longer be formed, because they would interfere with the claims of justice and humanity, and because it would be no longer necessary to keep alive the stream of the affections by confining them to a particular channel, when they would be continually refreshed, invigorated, and would overflow with the diffusive force of mutual philanthropy, and generous, undivided sympathy with men. Another feeling, no less necessary at present, would not be forgotten, namely, gratitude to benefactors; but not from a selfish, hateful spirit, or hardened insensibility to kind offices; because all men would in fact be equally ready to promote another's welfare, that is, equally benefactors and friends to each other, without the motives either of gratitude or self-interest. Promises, in like manner, would no longer be binding or necessary; not in order that men might take advantage of this liberty to consult their own whims or convenience, and trick one another; but that, by being free from every inferior obligation, they might be enabled more steadily and directly to pursue the simple dictates of reason and conscience. False honour, false shame, vain emulation, &c., would upon the same principle give way to other and better motives. It is evident that laws and punishments would cease with the cause that produces them, the commission of crime. Neither would the distinctions of property subsist in a society where the interests and feelings of all would be more intimately blended than they are at present among members of same family, or among the dearest friends. Neither the allurements of ease, or wealth, nor the dread of punishment, would be required to excite to industry, or to prevent fraud and violence, in a state (such as has been supposed) where all would cheerfully labour for the good of all; and where the most refined reason and inflexible justice, actuating a whole community, could scarcely fail to ensure the same effects which at present result from the motives of honesty and honour. The labour, therefore, requisite to produce the necessaries of life, would be equally divided among the members of such a community, and the remainder of their time would be spent in the pursuit of science, in the cultivation of the noblest arts, and in the most refined social and intellectual enjoyments.

However wild and visionary this scheme may appear, it is certain that its greatest fault is in expecting higher things of human nature than it seems at present capable of, and in exacting such a divine or angelic degree of virtue and wisdom, before it can be put in practice, as without a miracle in its favour must for ever prevent its becoming anything more than a harmless dream, a sport of the imagination, or "an exercise in the schools." But to consider a man as an immoral character, or a political delinquent, for having indulged in such speculations, is no less false or absurd than to stigmatise any one as a bad member of the community for having written a treatise on the Millennium. Yet with respect to Mr. Holcroft, this appears to have been "the very head and front of his offending."

CHAP. II.

THE first part of "Hugh Trevor," a novel, appeared in 1794, and the remainder in 1797. This novel is a work of less genius than "Anna St. Ives," but it is characterised by much sound sense, by a clear and vigorous style, by acute observation, and by many satirical but accurate portraits of modern manners. As a political work, it may be considered as a sequel to "Anna St. Ives;" for as that is intended to develop certain general principles by exhibiting imaginary characters, so the latter has a tendency to enforce the same conclusions by depicting the vices and distresses which are generated by the existing institutions of society. A lord and a bishop are among the most prominent figures. That such characters exist in fact, there cannot be a doubt; that the same is applied in too general and unqualified a manner, is an objection which may also be readily admitted; but it certainly is not necessary in order to enforce the imperfection of existing institutions and manners, that the profligacy which he has ascribed to characters should be universal. A very little of it is enough too much, were there any real and substantial remedy for evil.

The story of "Hugh Trevor" is less connected and interesting than that of "Anna St. Ives:" the excellence of the work is judged of from detached scenes and passages rather than considering it as a whole. Among the most striking passages the description of Oxford; Wakefield's conversations with Trevor; the disputes with Trotman on the study of the law; the character of Olivia's aunt, which is in the best style of the novels; the scene in the stage coach between the aunt, Olivia, and Hugh Trevor; the description given by Glibly of the character at the playhouse; and some of the scenes which occur in the history of Wilmot. The dialogues in "Hugh Trevor" are almost all of them highly spirited, and full of character, and the language is exactly that of animated conversation. Mr. Holcroft would not (might be expected) have an advantage in this respect over other writers in general from his habit of writing for the stage. Perhaps the finest things in "Hugh Trevor" are the account of an epistle found in Wilmot's pocket, after he had attempted to drown himself, and the song of "Gaffar Gray." Both these I shall extract, as they are short and detached, and in my opinion, at least, excellent pieces of writing.

The paper found in Wilmot's pocket, after the rash and fatal act to which he has been driven by repeated disappointments and extreme distress, is as follows: —

"This body, if ever it should be found, was once a thing which, by way of reproach among men, was called an author. It was about the earth despised and unnoticed, and died indigent and unlamented. It could hear, see, feel, smell, and taste, with much quickness, delicacy, and force, as other bodies. It had desires and passions like other bodies, but was denied the power of gratifying them by such as had the power and the will to engross the things of this world to themselves. The doors of the great shut upon it ; not because it was infected with disease, or contaminated with infamy, but on account of the fashion of the garments with which it was clothed, and the name it derived from its forefathers, and because it had not the habit of bending its knee where its heart owed no respect, nor the power of moving its tongue to gloze the crimes or flatter the follies of men. It was excluded the fellowship of such as heap up gold and silver ; not because it did, but for fear it might, ask a small portion of their beloved wealth. It shrunk with pain and pity from the haunts of ignorance, which the knowledge it possessed could not enlighten, and from guilt that its sensations were obliged to abhor. There was but one class of men with whom it was permitted to associate, and those were such as had feelings and misfortunes like its own, among whom it was its hard fate frequently to suffer imposition, from assumed worth and fictitious distress. Beings of supposed benevolence, capable of perceiving, loving, and promoting merit and virtue, have now and then seemed to flit and glide before it. But the visions were deceitful : ere they were distinctly seen, the phantoms vanished. Or, if such beings do exist, it has experienced the peculiar hardship of never having met with any, in whom both the purpose and the power were fully united. Therefore, with hands wearied with labour, eyes dim with watchfulness, veins but half nourished, and a mind at length subdued by intense study, and a reiteration of unaccomplished hopes, it was driven by irresistible impulse to end at once such a complication of evils. The knowledge was imposed upon it that, amid all these calamities, it had one consolation, — its miseries were not eternal — that itself had the power to end them. This power it has employed, because it found itself incapable of supporting any longer the wretchedness of its own situation, and the blindness and injustice of mankind ; and as, while it lived, it lived scorned and neglected, so it now commits itself to the waves, in expectation, after it is dead, of being mangled, belied, and insulted."

The song of Gaffar Gray is written in a less sombrous style, with a mixture of banter and irony. But it is distinguished by the same fulness of feeling, and the same simple, forcible, and perfect expression of it. There is nothing wanting, and nothing superfluous. The author has produced exactly the impression he intended.

"Ho ! Why dost thou shiver and shake,
Gaffar Gray !
And why doth thy nose look so blue ?
'Tis the weather that's cold,
'Tis I'm grown very old,
And my doublet is not very new,
Well-a-day !'

Then line thy worn doublet with ale,
Gaffar Gray;
And warm thy old heart with a glass.
'Nay, but credit I've none ;
And my money's all gone ;
Then say how may that come to pass ?
Well-a-day !'

Hie away to the house on the brow,
Gaffar Gray ;
And knock at the jolly priest's door.
'The priest often preaches Against worldly riches ;
But ne'er gives a mite to the poor,
Well-a-day !'

The lawyer lives under the hill,
Gaffar Gray ;
Warmly fenc'd both in back and in front.
'He will fasten his locks,
And will threaten the stocks,
Should he ever more find me in want,
Well-a-day !'

The 'Squire has fat beeves and brown ale,
Gaffar Gray ;
And the season will welcome you there.
'His fat beeves and his beer,
And his merry new year,
Are all for the flush and the fair,
Well-a-day !'

My keg is but low, I confess,
Gaffar Gray ;
What then? While it lasts, man, we'll live.
'The poor man alone,
When he hears the poor moan,
Of his morsel a morsel will give,
Well-a-day !'"

CHAP. III.

WE have hitherto beheld Mr. Holcroft only in the light of an author, or as a private man ; we have at present to consider him in that part of his history which was the most interesting to the public, and the most honourable to himself, of any of the circumstances of his life, — his behaviour under that most unaccountable, unjust, and groundless prosecution, which was instituted against him for high treason, in the year 1794. The account of this transaction will be given, nearly literally, from Mr. Holcroft's own "Narrative of Facts," published soon after. I shall only observe of this work, which is written in a style of manly and nervous eloquence, that it not only contains the most undeniable proofs of the author's innocence of the charge brought against him, and of the knowledge which the prosecutors themselves had of his innocence, but that it further shows Mr. Holcroft's character in a most amiable and respectable point of view. His regard to his family and friends, the steady uprightness of his mind, his ardent love of liberty, his utter abhorrence of all violent and sanguinary measures, and the sincerity, and even enthusiasm, with which he acted up to the principles he professed, are evident in every line of his narrative.

It was in the month of November, 1792, that he first became a member of the Society for Constitutional Information. The multitude of extraordinary events which at that period happened in France, excited people of all ranks to political inquiry ; and men were roused to a conviction, which, though obvious, yet seemed a recent discovery, that the political institutions of all nations essentially influence the morals and happiness of the people, and that these institutions are capable of improvement. The good was no sooner conceived, than an eagerness to enjoy it was begotten ; and this eagerness was frequently so impatient, as to excite a dread, that even if it did not defeat, it might lamentably retard, its own purpose.

At length, the apprehensions of those who thought it their interest to prevent any kind of change were awakened. Their numbers considerable, their wealth immense, their influence universal, their prejudices strong, and their appetites and passions almost their only means of enjoyment, they no sooner saw danger, than they conceived disgust for the supposed authors of it; and this disgust rapidly quickened into hatred. Animosity once conceived is generally mutual; and the passions of both parties seemed every day to become more and more inflamed, and to be pregnant with pernicious consequences.

Under such circumstances, it became (in Mr. Holcroft's opinion) the duty of every man to think seriously, and act with vigour. Passengers in a storm labour at the pump, and if they linger are upbraided, and in danger of being thrown overboard. Individual and general safety are the same; and the man who is not trusted with the helm, may yet aid in heaving the lead or casting the anchor.

Mr. Holcroft, believing that all men and all actions contribute more or less to the general good, had long been accustoming himself to keep that good in view. Stimulated by the considerations just mentioned, and by the events that pressed with daily astonishment on the mind, he ardently applied himself to the study of man, and the means of promoting his welfare, and lessening the evils that result from his present vices and imperfections. The chief of the principles, to which this inquiry led, were that man is happy in proportion as he is truly informed; that his ignorance, which is the parent of his misery and vices, is not a fault, but a misfortune, which can only be remedied by infusing juster principles and more enlightened notions into his mind; that punishment, violence, and rancour, only tend to inflame the passions, and perpetuate the mistakes they are meant to cure; and that, therefore, the best and only effectual means of ameliorating the condition of mankind, is by the gentleness of instruction, by steady inquiry, and by a calm but dauntless reliance on the progressive power of truth.

These principles being firmly rooted in his mind, Mr. Holcroft naturally became the opponent of all violence, and a determined friend to the publication of truth; since by that alone he thought the well-being of mankind could be promoted. With respect to the Society for Constitutional Information, of which he had become a member, he did not approve of many of their proceedings, nor was he altogether satisfied with the authority they seemed to assume of peremptorily deciding questions by a majority of votes, which he thought could only be decided by reason; but still he conceived that this was not a sufficient ground for absenting himself their meetings, as such an over-scrupulousness would exclude those who were best calculated to prevent such societies, in too great ardour to do good, from doing ill; since if he had to act with men so long as they were guilty of mistake, he banish himself wholly from their intercourse.

He entered this society, then, with a firm determination to use his endeavour to prevent violence and acrimony, to communicate with whom he knew, or imagined he knew, and to stimulate others to the same. Accordingly, while he remained a member of it, he interfered with the framing of a single resolution: when motions were put, he sometimes voted; and sometimes spoke to support his opinion, but was much oftener silent; either because he thought them frivolous, or such a mixture of right and wrong as to leave him undecided. He little imagined that it would be necessary for him to accuse their insignificant proceedings as treasonable; or less that he should be selected as one of the most wicked of conspirators.

His apprehensions of ministers had been first publicly announced by the proclamation of the 21st of May, 1792; and the coercive measures on which they had determined immediately appeared in parliamentary addresses, and the measures of the magistrates and royal officers throughout the kingdom. Associations were formed; and the danger of the constitution, from the wicked attempts of republicans and levellers, became the cry of what was called the aristocratic party. So active were these self-declared enemies of government, and so loud in their asseverations of approaching ruin,—the destruction of property, insurrection, and anarchy,—that quiet people began to partake of the fears of these men; and ministers, by more proclamations, asserted that insurrections did actually exist, which the militia was called out to suppress when not a hand or foot was stirring on any such pretences beyond the confines of Great Britain. Men even of respectable talents and honest intentions now thought it an heroic act of duty to watch the conduct of their intimate friends, excite them to violent or seditious expressions, and afterwards to turn their backs against the intemperance they had provoked. To avoid giving any opinion was impossible. Language the most outrageous was employed to make those who were in the least susceptible declare their creed; and if it were not entirely accommodated to the peaceable citizen, after being entrapped, was insulted, and turned, or frequently kicked out of tap-rooms, coffee-houses and public places. The impotence of the obnoxious party was everywhere demonstrated; yet the outcry of alarm increased. Church-and-king mobs were proved, in courts of justice, to have been encouraged by the very men whose office it was to keep the peace; while no insurrection, or shade of insurrection, appeared on the part of the people wishing for reform. In the same spirit, printers and booksellers all over the kingdom were hunted out for prosecution; and the tempest of insurrection and anarchy was so confidently affirmed to be rising and raging, that the House of Commons voted the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Bill, on the ground that dangerous and treasonable conspiracies did actually exist.

The society, of which Mr. Holcroft was a member, seemed with the progress of these events to increase in amazement, and it might almost be said, in stupefaction. This was visible in the thinness of its meetings, its feeble resolutions, and long adjournments. Each man saw himself the butt of obloquy. Each man knew that Mr. Reeves's association was sitting in a room of the same tavern immediately over his head; and that this association was the focus of the opprobrium cast on them all. They supposed themselves to be watched by the very waiters. Thus wantonly and unjustly set up as a mark for public reproach, it is not much to be wondered at, that some petulant ebullitions occasionally burst forth. But was this guilt so enormous? Was it high treason?

When Mr. Holcroft first heard that a few of its members had been taken into custody, he felt the greatest astonishment. "Surely," he said, "either there have been practices of which I am totally ignorant, or men are running mad!" The persons apprehended were severally, and some of them repeatedly, examined before the Privy Council. The three estates of the kingdom had declared the existence of treason and conspiracy; and the nation seemed generally to credit the assertion. Mr. Holcroft had been told more than once that a warrant was issued against him. Incredible as the rumour would have been at any other time, he now believed it to be true.

A warrant having according to report been issued against him, made it probable that he should also be examined before the Privy Council; and he therefore prepared for the event. The late John Hunter, and other medical men, had prescribed sea-bathing for

; and he intended to have gone out of town for this purpose. On the first report of the warrant, he determined not to go, but took care to appear publicly, that he might not seem to evade duty. Many surmises and rumours prevailed during the summer of 1794. One week the persons in custody were immediately brought to trial; the next it was said the Crown lawyers had declared that a case of treason could not be made out, and that they would be tried for seditious practices. At length, when the air seemed almost to have sunk into forgetfulness, it was suddenly revived; and a commission was appointed on the 11th then proposed highly improbable charge of high-treason. The proceeding astonished Mr. Holcroft, as well as others; but he had no idea was intended that he should be involved in it.

Soon, however, assertions to the contrary were spread; and many serious reflections suggested themselves to his mind. "Surely," said he, "this age has more general information, and therefore more virtue, more wisdom, than the past. There cannot be another Meal-tub Plot. No Titus Oates could now impose his incredible fictions on mankind. Or is it possible that sophistry may have convinced itself that it is better twelve men, the partisans of reform, should die, than that Government should seem to have disgraced itself by asserting the existence of a treasonable conspiracy without any proof?" At one moment he could not believe himself in danger; at the next, the facts that stared him in the face destroyed every ground of rational calculation, and left his mind bewildered in suspense. It was at this period that Mr. Holcroft addressed the following letter to his daughter and her husband, who were in Devonshire* :—

"MY DEAR FRIENDS AND CHILDREN,

"The reason of my writing to you at this moment is to prevent any unnecessary alarm; to which, indeed, I hope you would not have been very liable, even if I had not written, and if you had previously heard the strange intelligence I am about to communicate, through any other channel.

"It is asserted in the 'Morning Post' of to-day, and I have before received the same information from various people, that a bill is to be presented to the grand jury, containing a charge of high-treason against thirteen persons, of whom I am one. As it is impossible that either this or any other crime against the Government can be proved on me (my principles and practice having been so totally opposite to such supposed crimes), I hope, and most seriously recommend, that you will feel the same tranquillity I do. The charge is so false and so absurd, that it has not once made my heart beat. For my own part, I feel no enmity against those who endeavour thus to injure me; being persuaded, that in this, as in all other instances, it is but the guilt of ignorance. They think they are doing their duty: I will continue to do mine, to the very utmost of my power; and on that will cheerfully rest my safety. I must again conjure you to feel neither alarm nor uneasiness. Remember the most virtuous of men are liable to be misunderstood, and falsely accused. But the virtuous man has no need to fear accusation. If it be true that my name is in the indictment, it will oblige me again to defer the happiness of seeing you, and the hope of recruiting my health by the excursion. Of the latter it is true I have need, and to be a witness of your happiness would give me no small pleasure: but the man of fortitude knows how to submit to all necessities; and, if he be wise, frequently to turn events which others consider as most disastrous, to some beneficent end. Shall I own to you, that though I could not wish to be falsely accused, yet being so accused, I now feel an anxious desire to be heard? Let my principles and actions be inquired into, and published: if they have been erroneous, let them become moral lessons to others; if the reverse, the instruction they will afford may more effectually answer the same purpose. I hope, Sophy, you know something of me; endeavour to communicate what you know to Mr. Cole, and your mutual fears will then surely be very few. Observe that, as I have yet received no notice whatever from Government, I have the above intelligence only from report. If it be false, I shall soon be with you; if the contrary, you of course will hear from me the moment I have any thing to communicate. Be happy, act virtuously, and disdain to live the slaves of fear.

* Sophy, Mr. Holcroft's second daughter, had a little before been married to Mr. Cole, a merchant at Exeter.

“Newman Street, Sept. 30. 1794.”

On the same day he sent the following letter to the “Morning Post,” which was published the next day.

To the Editor of the "Morning Post."

"SIR,

"In your paper of yesterday, my name is mentioned among those said to be inserted in a bill to be presented to a grand jury on Thursday next, containing charges of high-treason. If this be the fact, I have no wish to influence the public opinion by a previous affirmation of my own innocence: I desire only to appear before my country. However, as I have not been a day absent from home for more than twelve months, and never received from any magistrate the least intimation of any suspicion against me, till I have official notice, my own consciousness obliges me to consider your intelligence as unfounded.

"In either case, it is a duty I owe myself to declare that I am now, and always shall be, ready to answer every accusation."

The see-saw of contradictory reports continued for some days. A daily paper asserted, and it is professed with authority, that the rumour of Mr. Holcroft's being included in the indictment was absolutely false; and a friend, who had determined (should it prove true) to give him every aid in his power, quitted town the very day before the bill was returned. Mr. Holcroft was preparing to do the same. Not only he, indeed, but all his friends had concluded that the report would prove false, it being so excessively improbable. In this mistake he remained till Monday, October 6th, at three in the afternoon; when another friend came running to inform him that he had that moment come from Hicks's Hall, where he had heard an indictment for high-treason read against twelve persons, of whom he was one. Mr. Holcroft's sensations were of a kind not easily to be described; but he neither felt excessive indignation, excessive alarm, nor any of those passions which might perhaps have been excusable in his situation.

The friend who had brought the intelligence, felt less determined. He was a man of an acute mind, but a lawyer; and knowing the equivocal spirit of law, and the hazard incurred from the ignorance and prejudice even of the best-intentioned jurymen, he advised immediate flight. Mr. Holcroft had, however, no great difficulty in convincing him that his resolution was taken. He had now to communicate the event with as much caution as possible to his family. And here he had a most painful scene to undergo. His father (who was now with him), in a passionate burst of tears, entreaties, and exclamations, conjured him to fly. His age, and the circumstances in which he had lived, rendered him a very unfit counsellor for such an occasion; and the only means Mr. Holcroft had of calming his agitated spirits, was by the firmness of his own behaviour, his declared resolution to face his accusers, and, by appealing to his own knowledge of him, how far it was possible he should be guilty.

The intrepidity of his behaviour inspired his parents and children with courage. He thought it prudent, however, to leave them, that he might consult with his own mind, and with some friends, concerning the properest mode of surrendering himself; and learning that the court was to meet the next day at Hicks's Hall, he went to the house of his solicitor and friend, Mr. Foulkes, where, with some other persons, he supped. He did not return home, but slept here.

The next morning he appeared in court, accompanied by his solicitor and another gentleman of the law; where, as soon as the business of the court would permit, he thus addressed himself to Lord Chief Justice Eyre.

Mr. Holcroft. "My lord, being informed that a bill for high-treason has been preferred against me, Thomas Holcroft, by his majesty's Attorney-General, and returned a true bill by a grand jury of these realms, I come to surrender myself to this court, and my country, to be put upon my trial, that, if I am a guilty man, the whole extent of my guilt may become notorious; and, if innocent, that the rectitude of my principles and conduct may be no less public. And I hope, my lord, there is no appearance of vaunting in assuring your lordship, this court, and my country, that, after the misfortune of having been suspected as an enemy to the peace and happiness of mankind, there is nothing on earth after which, as an individual, I more ardently aspire than a full, fair, and public examination. I have further to request, that your lordship will inform me, if it be not the practice in these cases to assign counsel, and to suffer the accused to speak in his own defence? Likewise, whether free egress and regress be not allowed to such persons, books, and papers, as the accused or his counsel shall deem necessary for justification?"

Chief Justice. "With regard to the first, sir, it will be the duty of the court to assign you counsel, and also to order that uch counsel shall have free access to you at all proper hours. With respect, sir, to the liberty of speaking for yourself, the accused will be fully heard by himself, as well as by his counsel; but with regard to papers, books, and other things of that kind, it is impossible for me to say anything precisely, until the thing required be asked. However, sir, you may depend upon it, everything will be granted to the party accused, so as to enable him to make his defence. If I understand you rightly, you now admit that you are the person standing indicted by the name of Thomas Holcroft."

Mr. Holcroft. "That, indeed, my lord, is what I cannot affirm — I have it only from report."

Chief Justice. "You come here to surrender yourself; and I can only accept of that surrender on the supposition that you are the person so indicted. You know the consequence, sir, of being indicted for high-treason. I shall be under the necessity of ordering you into custody. I would not wish to take any advantage of your coming forward in person, indiscreetly, in this manner, without being called upon by the ordinary processes of the law. You should have a moment to consider whether you surrender yourself as that person."

Mr. Holcroft. "It is certainly not my wish, either to inflict upon myself unnecessary punishment, or to put myself in unnecessary danger. I come only as Thomas Holcroft, of Newman Street, in the county of Middlesex; and I certainly do not wish to stand more forward than an innocent person ought to stand."

Chief Justice. "I cannot enter into this point. If you admit yourself to be the person indicted, the consequence must be, that I must order you to be taken into custody to answer this charge. I do not know whether you are or are not Thomas Holcroft. I do not know you; and therefore it is impossible for me to know whether you are the person stated in the indictment."

Mr. Holcroft. "It is equally impossible for me, my lord."

Chief Justice. "Why then, sir, I think you had better sit still. — Is there anything moved on the part of the Crown with respect to this gentleman?"

Solicitor-General. "My lord, as I consider him to be the person against whom a true bill is found, I move that he be committed."

Chief Justice. "I do not know how many persons there may be of the name of Thomas Holcroft: it would be rather extraordinary to commit a person on this charge, if we do not know him."

This produced a short consultation between the Solicitor-General, the other counsel for the Crown, and Mr. White. They were evidently surprised, and not pleased, at his appearance; and one of them, Mr. Knapp, began an argument to prove that he admitted himself to be the person indicted. He was interrupted by the Chief Justice, who again asked if the counsel for the Crown thought fit to move that he should be committed? which was accordingly moved by the Solicitor-General; and he was taken into custody by a sheriff's officer, Mr. Cawdron.

After naming Messieurs Erskine and Gibbs for his counsel, Mr. Holcroft asked the bench whether he might be allowed an amanuensis, while he was preparing his defence; but this request was declined by the Chief Justice, unless it was urged on the score of health. Mr. Holcroft was really in a state of ill-health; but as that was not his motive for asking it, he would not take advantage of this circumstance.

The court then adjourned; but he was detained three quarters of an hour: the reason assigned was, that the warrant was making out; but Mr. Holcroft believed the true reason to be, that the Crown lawyers were consulting how he was to be treated, and sending to the higher powers for instructions.

About half-past one o'clock the same day, a person came to Mr. Holcroft's house in Newman Street, inquired if he was at home, and seemed at first unwilling to tell his business. He said he came from Mr. Munden; but afterwards owned he was not a friend of Mr. Munden, but pretended that he had been with him to inquire Mr. Holcroft's place of abode. He repeatedly asked the Miss Holcrofts if they were sure he was not at home; and they by this time suspecting him to be an officer, replied, he might search the house, though he might be assured their father was not at home, for that he had never taught them to tell untruths; and to prove their sincerity, added, that he was gone to the Privy Council to surrender himself. "No," answered he; "that he certainly is not; for I am but just come from the Privy Council." He then showed his watch, that they might take notice it was half-past one o'clock. Mr. Holcroft's daughters replied, that they might be mistaken, and if so, that he was gone to the Old Bailey. Being now under-

to be a messenger, they asked if he intended to come in and heir father's papers; for, on showing his authority, he was rty to make any search. He replied, that there was quite ent without the papers; after which, he went away, saying, f the accused had surrendered himself, it would save him e.

se circumstances being related to Mr. Holcroft, led him to e that a messenger had been despatched from Hicks's Hall Privy Council; and that to preserve the decorum of autho- his person had then been sent to his house: for the effrontery rendering himself was by his prosecutors and their partisans ht intolerable.

er waiting a considerable time, the warrant at length appeared, ie prisoner was attended to Newgate by the officer and one : under-sheriffs; both of whom behaved to him with great ness. Here, instead of being committed to close confinement, he other persons accused, he was allowed the same liberty of ng in the court-yard, and visiting his fellow-prisoners, which nted to persons confined for inferior crimes.

step which Mr. Holcroft had taken, as soon as it was 1, excited the admiration of his friends, and probably of his es; though the latter were careful to keep this feeling within own bosoms. The hireling prints of the day immediately to pour out their dastardly sneers and mechanical abuse st him, converting an act of true fortitude, arising from con- integrity, into the vapouring of a hypocrite, who wished in the reputation of courage without the risk. The fol- 5 paragraph appeared two days after in the "St. James's Chro-
" —

Mr. Holcroft, the playwright and performer, pretty well 1 for the democratical sentiments which he has industriously red through the lighter works of literature, such as plays, 5 songs, &c., surrendered himself on Tuesday at Clerkenwell ns House, requesting to know if he was the person against the grand jury had found a bill for high-treason. After little altercation, in which Mr. Holcroft seemed to affect some pence, he was ordered into custody. This gentleman seems d of speechifying, that he will probably plead his own cause t, though counsel were assigned to him. We do not under- he is in any imminent danger; and suppose, from his behaviour, he has the idea of obtaining the reputation of to liberty at an easy rate. We have that respect for s of his talents, that we really hope his vanity will be gra having run the danger, without suffering the punisher traitor ! ”

What a pleasant kind of Government that must be, v fond of playing at this mock tragedy of indictments treason with any person who wishes to gain popularit expense, that the danger arising from their prosecutions subject of jest and buffoonery even by their own creatur miserable scribbler seems not to have been aware, tha was accusing Mr. Holcroft of vanity and shallow cunning bringing the most serious charge against the ministe they trifled with the life and character of an individu absurd and improbable evidence, that not only the p self, but every one else, must laugh at his supposed d was, however, in consequence of this fine opportunity lessly afforded him by his prosecutors, for ensuring popl an easy rate,” that Mr. Holcroft was afterwards shunned by plain, well-meaning people, who were persuaded treason was a serious thing ; that he was branded as “ a felon ; ” that he became a mark for venal pens and tongues ; that he met with continued unrelenting host attempts to succeed as a dramatic writer ; that he w driven from his country as a proscribed man ; that wh he was singled out, suspected, and pointed at as a spy after he returned home, harassed by repeated disappoint closed a life of literary labour and active benevolence, v that his name might remain as a blot upon his famil death. And all this, because Mr. Holcroft had, by sor accident, through sport or wantonness, been included in ment for high-treason : for his innocence was so notorious the time he delivered himself up, he was insulted by the of the minister for having wished to purchase the reput martyr at an easy rate ; and that he was afterwards acqui out being even brought to a trial, there not being the dence, or shadow of evidence, against him. Mr. Holcro only not called upon to make any defence, but he was from making one, as altogether unnecessary and impert prosecution against him having been withdrawn. Could a prosecution of this kind reflect real disgrace on the person so accused, and so acquitted?

Locked within the walls of Newgate, Mr. Holcroft had full time for meditation. His first duty was to defend himself by showing the falsehood of the accusation ; but it was a duty which at this time he knew not how to discharge. He had no documents, nor could he tell of what he was accused.

He had remained in this suspense a few days, when Mr. Kirby, the keeper of Newgate, one morning came, desired that he would follow him ; and led him through the otherwise impassable gates to an apartment in his own house. Here he was introduced to Mr. White, the solicitor for the Treasury, and his two clerks ; and this gentleman presented him with the indictment, a list of witnesses, and another list of the jurymen summoned for these trials ; informing him at the same time that the Crown would grant as many subpoenas, without expense, as he should think proper to demand. Mr. Holcroft received the indictment, bowed, withdrew, and was reconducted to the place of confinement.

His eagerness to examine the charges brought against him, the list of the witnesses who were his accusers, and the names of the persons by some of whom he was to be tried, was great ; so was the astonishment he felt after examining the papers. He was indicted with eleven other persons in the same bill, for whose actions he was to answer, when or wheresoever committed, though totally without his knowledge or participation. There was not a specific statement of any one action of the prisoner ; but general affirmations concerning the collective actions of twelve men, together with other unknown conspirators, which, with regard to himself at least, he knew to be absolutely, and without exception, false. A promiscuous list of 208 witnesses was also given him, nine-tenths of whom were utter strangers to him in person, abode, and even name ; and of whom not one had any possible charge to bring against him. Yet he was left, out of all this inexplicable confusion, to conjecture (if he could) who were his accusers, and of what they were to accuse him. Mr. Holcroft intended to have entered a protest to this effect against the indictment ; but he was overruled by his counsel.

The Tuesday following, the trials began. " And perhaps this country," says Mr. Holcroft "never witnessed a moment more portentous. The hearts and countenances of men seemed pregnant with doubt and terror. They waited, in something like stupor of amazement, for the fearful sentence on which their deliverance, or their destruction, seemed to depend. Never sure was the public mind more profoundly agitated. The whole power of Government was directed against Thomas Hardy: in his fate seemed involved the fate of the nation, and the verdict of Not Guilty appeared to burst its bonds, and to have released it from inconceivable miseries, and ages of impending slavery. The acclamations of the Old Bailey reverberated from the furthest shores of Scotland, and a whole people felt the enthusiastic transports recovered freedom."

Though no person partook more largely than Mr. Holcroft in the general joy, it was not on his own account. It was a conviction which he could not get from his mind, that his accuser had never any intention of producing evidence against him. Yet knowing how dangerous it might be to be found unprepared, he had laboured at his defence with the same ardour as if he were sure of being brought to trial; and the belief that he should not was the only thought that gave him pain. To be thus publicly accused, and not as publicly heard; to have it supposed throughout the kingdom that he was involved in transactions which, though surely not treasonable, were such as he could not but highly disapprove, and of which he never heard till the reports of the Secret Committee were published,—this was an evil which he would have given his right hand to have avoided. After the trial of Mr. Tooke, he plainly foresaw that he should not be called upon for his defence. He hoped, however, that he should be permitted to state a few simple facts concerning himself in the open court: but neither was this allowed him.

Mr. Holcroft was committed to Newgate on the 7th of October, where he remained eight weeks within a day. On Saturday, November the 29th, he received the following notice:—

"THE KING against THOMAS HARDY, and others.

"I am directed, by Mr. Attorney-General, to inform you that it is his intention that you should be brought to the bar at the Old Bailey on Monday morning next; and that a jury should then sworn for your trial, but that he does not propose to give evidence against you upon this indictment.

“JOSEPH WHITE,

“Solicitor for the Crown,

29th Nov. 1794.

“To Thomas Holcroft, one of the defendants
in the above indictment.”

On Monday, December 1st, Mr. Bonney, Mr. Kyd, Mr. Joyce, and Mr. Holcroft, were put to the bar ; and, in the language of the court, honourably acquitted. The other gentlemen bowed, and retired : Mr. Holcroft attempted to speak, and the Chief Justice seemed at first willing that he should go on, though a thing not customary ; but Mr. Holcroft having intimated that he should detain the court nearly half an hour, he was immediately ordered to withdraw. Whether he was not wrong in expecting such a favour, and consequently in subjecting himself to a refusal, I will not here pretend to determine ; but I confess it was a mistake, which men in general may safely blame, for it proceeded from motives which few persons are capable of feeling.

The chief circumstances which Mr. Holcroft meant to have stated in the defence he had drawn up, were, that his prosecutors had proof that, instead of being a traitor, a mover of war and rebellion, and a killer of kings, he was a man whose principles and practice were the very reverse. That evidence to this effect had been given before the Privy Council ; and that there was no evidence whatever that he was in any instance a disturber of the public peace. That in the Constitutional Society of which he was a member, and under pretence of which he had been indicted for high-treason, he was theoretically the adversary of all force whatever ; and that practically he concurred with the members who were most desirous of promoting reform, in urging that it must be by the peaceable means of persuasion, by the conviction of the understanding, not by force of arms. The proofs which Mr. Holcroft had of these particulars were the evidence of Mr. Sharp, the engraver, and Mr. Symmonds. Mr. Holcroft having written to Mr. Sharp, desiring an account of his examination, received the following answer :

“Copy of my [that is, Mr. Sharp's] testimony, which I signed at the Privy Council.

“The Society for Constitutional Information adjourned, and left the delegates in the room. The most gentleman-like person (of the Corresponding Society) took the chair, and talked about an equal representation of the people, and of putting an end to war. Holcroft talked about the powers of the human mind."

"This," says Mr. Sharp, "is the whole that I signed. The other particulars of the conversation before the Privy Council are as follows:—

"Mr. Holcroft talked a great deal about peace, of his being against any violent or coercive means, that were usually resorted to against our fellow creatures; urged the more powerful operation of philosophy and reason to convince man of his errors; that he would disarm his greatest enemy by those means, and oppose his fury. — Spoke also about truth being powerful; and gave advice to the above effect to the delegates present, who all seemed to agree, as no person opposed his arguments. This conversation lasted better than an hour, and we departed. The next time the delegates met, Holcroft was not present. This is the substance of what I remember of that conversation."

Mr. Sharp was again examined before the grand jury, and this was his evidence. "I mentioned Mr. Holcroft's disposition at a conversation, when we met, about reasoning men out of their errors, who was a sort of natural Quaker, and was for the peaceable means that philosophy and reason point out to convince mankind. He was against violence of all kinds; but did not believe in the secret impulses of the Spirit, like the Quakers."

The evidence of Mr. Symmonds was to the same purpose. Mr. Adams, also, the secretary of the Constitutional Society, has several times declared his utter astonishment that Mr. Holcroft in particular could be indicted; because of the repeated and ardent manner in which he and every body had heard him declare his sentiments in favour of peace and non-resistance.

On evidence like this was Mr. Holcroft indicted and committed to prison as guilty of high-treason.

The only circumstance which seems to throw any light on this mysterious transaction, which resembles a dream, or the extravagance of a bewildered imagination, rather than any thing real, is the following. Some months before the presenting the bill of indictment, Mr. Holcroft had called, with another friend, on Mr. Sharp, who had been apprehended, but was suffered to remain in his own house in the custody of an officer. Mr. Holcroft made marks intimating his dislike of violence. This the officer, a king's messenger, but of a lower and more illiterate order, seemed to feel as an attack upon his profession ; and turning to Holcroft, whom he no doubt conceived to be a dangerous man, he affirmed that he had seen him at the meetings of the Corresponding Society. This was denied ; and he again asserted he had seen him there. The man who could imagine and persist in a falsehood, might imagine and persist in another. On making his assertion, Mr. Holcroft said to him, "It is a lie, sir !" The man afterwards said, that if he had not seen him at the Corresponding Society, he had seen him at Mr. Thelwall's lectures ; to which Mr. Holcroft replied, that he had been there once, and never but once, at a lecture delivered by Thelwall. This short scene was, however, construed into a challenge to affront the officer, produce violence, and favour the cause of Mr. Sharp ; over whom, on the man's reporting this tale to the Privy Council, a double guard was placed the next day. This is the history of the share which Mr. Holcroft had in the high-treason.*

The remainder of Mr. Holcroft's pamphlet is taken up with letters to diffusers concerned in the prosecution, and the larger defence which he had in case he should be brought to a trial. They evidently show more candour and honesty, than prudence or management, and denote some sense and a raised tone of the public mind. In the letter to Erskine, which is a recent composition, the following trait is mentioned. While Erskine was naming the spy Alexander, who, had he not been detected, might have cost the life of Hardy, this eminent barrister, observing his downcast countenance, and suddenly interrupting him, exclaimed—"Look at the jury, don't look at me. I have seen enough of you."

Mr. Holcroft, in the second part of his defence, labours the point of a parliamentary reform ; and among other proofs of the corrupt state of representation, mentions the following curious one.

Mr. Gough of Gattton, within these two years, was publicly advertised for sale : not sold for a single parliament ; but the fee simple of the right with the power of nominating the two representatives, for ever. On the day of sale, the celebrated auctioneer scarcely noticed the value of the estate. He showed the mansion, the views, the woods and waters, were unworthy regard, to what he called an elegant contingency ! Yes, the right of nominating members to parliament, without the embarrassment of voters, was an elegant contingency ! 'Need I tell you, gentlemen,' said he, glancing round the room with a visible self-satisfaction, and exulting in what he called 'the jewel, the rich jewel' was under his hammer ; need I tell you, gentlemen, that this contingency is the only infallible source of fortune, titles, and honours, in this country ? That it leads to the highest situations in the state ? And considering through the tempting sinuosities of ambition, the purchaser is in a margin strewn with roses, and his head quickly crowned with those

CHAP. IV.

MR. HOLCROFT may be considered from this time as a public character ; for the remainder of his life in a great measure received its colour from his conduct on this occasion, and from the opinion and feelings of the public with respect to him. These were, of course, much divided. That he had been accused of high-treason, was sufficient to draw forth the hatred, execrations, and unqualified abuse of one party ; that he was an object of the open and rankling animosity of this party, was in like manner the cause of the favour he received from the violent and vulgar of the opposite party. But there was a third class of persons, inferior in number, as they necessarily would be, of whom Mr. Holcroft might perhaps be considered as the head, namely, those who being detached either by inclination or situation from the violence of either party, admired him for the firmness and honesty of his behaviour, and for the bold but benevolent tendency of his principles. His principles, indeed, were of such a kind, that they could not but strike and win upon the admiration of young and ingenuous minds, of those whose hearts are warm, and their imaginations strong and active, and whose generous and aspiring impulses seem almost to demonstrate the efficacy of disinterested and enlightened motives over the human mind, till it is hardened, depressed, distorted from its original direction, and bowed down under the yoke of example and prejudice. In this view of the subject, indeed, we should be tempted to assert, that men do not become what by nature they are meant to be, but what society makes them. The generous feelings and higher propensities of the soul are, as it were, shrunk up, seared, violently wrenched, and amputated, to fit us for our intercourse with the world, something in the manner that beggars maim and mutilate their children, to make them fit for their future situation in life.

precious garlands that flourish in full vigour round the fountain of honour ? On this halcyon sea, if any gentleman who has made his fortune in either of the Indies chooses once more to embark, he may repose in perfect quiet. No hurricanes to dread ; no tempestuous passions to allay ; no tormenting claims of insolent electors to evade ; no tinkers' wives to kiss ; no impossible promises to make ; none of the toilsome and not very clean paths of canvassing to drudge through ; but, his mind at ease and his conscience clear, with this elegant contingency in his pocket, the honours of the state await his plucking, and with its emoluments his purse will overflow."

That love of truth and virtue which seems at all times natural to eral-minded youth, was at this time carried to a pitch of enthusiasm, as well by the extraordinary events that had taken place, as by the romantic prospects of ideal excellence which were pictured in the writings of philosophers and poets. A new world was opening to the astonished sight. Scenes, lovely as hope can paint, dawned on the imagination: visions of unalloyed bliss lulled the senses, and hid the darkness of surrounding objects, rising in bright succession and endless gradations, like the steps of that ladder which was once set up on the earth, and whose top reached heaven. Nothing was too mighty for this new-begotten hope: the path that led to human happiness seemed as plain, as the structures in the "Pilgrim's Progress" leading to Paradise. Imagination was unable to keep pace with the gigantic strides of reason, and the strongest faith fell short of the supposed reality. This anticipation of what men were to become, could not but have influence on what they were. The standard of morality was raised high: and this circumstance must excite an ardent emulation in the minds of many persons to set an example of true and interested virtue, unshackled by the prejudices or interests of those around them. The curb of prudence was taken off; nor was it thought that a zeal for what was right could be carried to an excess. There is no doubt that this system would be taken advantage of by the selfish and hypocritical to further their own views at the expense of others; but it is equally certain that it would add new force to the practice of virtue in the liberal and well-disposed mind.

Kind feelings and generous actions there always have been, and there always will be, while the intercourse of mankind shall endure: but the hope, that such feelings and such actions might become universal, rose and set with the French Revolution. That light seems to have been extinguished for ever in this respect. The French Revolution was the only match that ever took place between philosophy and experience: and waking from the trance of theory to the sense of reality, we hear the words, truth, reason, justice, liberty, with the same indifference or contempt, as the man who has married a jilt or a termagant, listens to the rhapsody of lovers.*

The above passage was written in a state of perfect security against the use of that pleasant phrase, divine right. Every thing is by comparison.

The "Narrative of Facts" was shortly after followed by the "Letter to Mr. Windham," in consequence of the expression "acquitted felon," applied by him to the persons lately tried. This letter is written in the spirit of a philosopher addressing a philosopher. It is certainly one of the best productions of the day. It is temperate, firm, acute, and forcible. Of the spirit in which it is written, equally remote from insipid affectation or vulgar abuse, the introductory paragraph may be given as an example. It is as follows :—

" SIR,

" The Members of the House of Commons have arrogated to themselves many customs and privileges ; which they consider, some as rights to indulge in parliamentary invective, and others, as limitations to those rights. Personalities affecting members of that house are contrary to order ; but men, unprotected by the sanctified walls of St. Stephen's Chapel, may be the objects of assertions, which, if made anywhere else, would subject the authors of them to such correction as the law affords ; or as honour, half idiot, half demon, demands. For my own part, I should never attempt to unsheath the sword of the law, much less the sword of the assassin : at least, if it were possible to oblige me to the former, the case must indeed be extreme. Under such defence as the law affords, I have been, and may again be obliged to shield myself against false charges ; for I have no better public protection. But that a man of keen sensibility, and quick apprehension, whose distinctions and discriminations are frequently so fine drawn, and so shaded, that, like colours in the rainbow, their mingled differences cannot be discerned ; that a man who labours to be so cautious in his logic, should so often be hurried into the spleen of a cynic, the rashness of a boy, and the petulance of a child, is something extraordinary. There may be many such characters, but they are seldom so situated as to obtrude themselves so frequently and forcibly as you have done into public notice. However, when they do, they are well worthy the attention of the politician and the philosopher, the man of business and the man of science. My purpose in this address is not to write a libel, or to display my talents for satire. It has a more worthy purpose. It is to warn you and the nation against the effervescence of your passions. The intemperance of public men is tendously awful at all times; but when it plunges millions into the miseries of war, it rises into inexpressible horror. It is strange, that from real benevolence of intention, mischiefs which are ascribed to fiends should be the result. Yet this apparent paradox has of late been too repeatedly, and too carefully, proved. . . , sir, and that extraordinary man, Mr. Burke, whose kind but generous heart, whose splendid but ill-employed talents, have led astray, are among the examples."

It was not my intention to have troubled the reader with any other remarks on the subject of the trial; but there is one passage in Mr. Holcroft's letter which exposes the sophistry and the abuse of the phrase, which is the subject of it, in so clear and entirely a manner, that I cannot forbear quoting it.

Figure to yourself, sir, the first on the list of these 'acquitted as,' Hardy. What were his views? What his incitements? A man of no learning, excellent in his morals, simple in his manners, whether they were wise or foolish, highly virtuous in his intentions. Do you imagine he meant to make himself prime minister? Were these the marks of a prime minister? Had he the commanding spirit, the deep plans, and the towering genius of a Cromwell? No one will affirm things so extravagant. He was a good and active man in his endeavour to procure a parliamentary reform. This he thought, and I think, would have been the best of public blessings. For this he was tried, and declared Guilty. The whole country rang with the verdict, and the passions of the people were divided between joy at his deliverance and their own, and the contemplation of an innocent man who had so long been in danger of the most dreadful and barbarous death the merciless law decrees. Compare such a man to 'acquitted felon,' who has escaped by the means you have enumerated: a man, who so far from exciting the benevolence of a whole people, keeps all who ever heard his name in a state of dread, lest he should meet them on the highway, or break into their houses by night, and murder them in their sleep. Some of his action, perhaps many such, he has already committed. At last he is taken; and knowing no better mode, they hope by his death to be freed from their fears. They are disappointed: a flaw in the indictment, a misnomer, or some technical blunder is committed: he is set free, and they are again subject to his depredations, and to all their former terrors. Will you affirm, sir, that there are any common qualities, any kindred sympathies, and moral resemblance, between such a man and Thomas Hardy?—Whatever the feelings of the people of England were before the trials, be assured they cannot now endure a repetition of such odious falsehoods. You could not be then ignorant of the public sentiment, and in your burning haste to do right you could not be guilty of this intolerable wrong, were your imagination less heated and your intercourse with different ranks of people more general. You may perhaps now and then hear a dissentient voice; but you usually mix with men, who, like the parrot educated on board a man-of-war, can only repeat the same outrages and the same insults. You hear nothing else, and nothing else can you say. Would, sir, you would keep better company!”

The very just distinction which Mr. Holcroft draws between the errors of such men as Pitt and Dundas, who were actuated almost entirely by interest and ambition, and those of men, like Burke or Windham*, who were actuated almost entirely by imagination, system, and reasoning, shows that the letter-writer himself was not a vulgar politician, joining in the common cry of a party.

* Though the character of Mr. Windham, as a statesman and orator, was less developed at that time than it has been since, it seems to have been justly appreciated by our author. He considered him as the disciple of Mr. Burke; and it is certainly some distinction to be able to understand the arguments, and follow the enthusiastic flights, of that great but irregular mind. He is at present (with one exception) the ablest speaker in the House of Commons; but he is still, and ever will be, nothing more than an imitator of Burke. There is, in all his speeches, an infinite fund of wit, of information, of reading, of ingenuity, of taste, of refinement, of every thing but force and originality; but of these last, there is a total absence. All is borrowed, artificial, cast like plaster figures in a mould. The creations of his mind are as multiplied, and they are as brittle. Perhaps it may be thought that the want of originality is the last thing which should be objected to this delightful speaker, all whose sentences sparkle with singularity and paradox. But this effect is equally mechanical with the rest. Real originality produces occasional, not systematic, paradox. He who always waits to contradict others has no opinion of his own. It is as easy to predict the side which Mr. Windham will take on any question, as to guess what the first old woman you meet would think on the same subject; for you may be sure that his opinion will be the contrary of hers. His creed is a sort of antithesis to common sense, and he is as much the slave of vulgar prejudices in always opposing as if he always yielded to them. Originality consists in considering things as they are, independently of what others think; singularity is mere common-place transposed. The one requires the utmost exercise of the judgment; the other suspends the use of it altogether. [These remarks were written in 1810, before Mr. Windham's death.]

CHAP. V.

HE'S FRAILTIES" came out in the beginning of 1794, at Covent Garden. This play met with indifferent success, of which the pal cause was a supposed allusion to political subjects in passages. One of these in particular excited the most violent ment: "A sentence in itself so true," says Mr. Holcroft, "as e been repeated under a thousand different modes; and, a variety of forms and phraseology, to have been proverbial countries." This obnoxious passage was the one in which Campbell, when insulted by a fashionable coxcomb, who hat profession he was bred to, says that "he was bred to ost useless, and often the most worthless, of all professions, a gentleman." In this comedy, the author has more point-han in any other, set up the claims of worth and virtue t the arrogant assumptions of wealth and rank. That virtue confers true dignity, has, however, been the common-place of teachers of morality and religion in all ages. But such time was the irritation of party feeling, that to exhibit the of this trite maxim on the stage seems to have been rel as an innovation on common sense, and as big with the of social disorganisation.

he Deserted Daughter," "The Man of Ten Thousand," "The of Ridicule," and "Knave or Not," successively appeared in 1796, 1797, and 1798. The three last of these appeared at Lane. "The Deserted Daughter," and "He's much to , were acted at Covent Garden.

all these "The Deserted Daughter" was received with the st applause, and it is perhaps the best of Mr. Holcroft's comedies. The characters of Mordent, of Lady Ann, and ularly of the faithful old servant, Donald, are drawn with force and feeling. The character of Mordent is that of a opher, moralising on the passions and vices of other men, and d away by his own. He has abandoned, or refused to own, ghter, the offspring of a former clandestine marriage, in order id the sneers of the world, and the contempt of the rich and ful connections of his second wife. He maintains and brings as a natural daughter, but without seeing or acknowledging her. This the girl, who has a high spirit and quick sensibility, resents as an unmerited punishment; and determines either to suffer to cast herself at her father's feet, and for once receive blessing, or to throw herself on the mercy of strangers. In consequence of this, she is decoyed into a house of ill-fame, by one of the hoary priestesses of vice, under pretence of affording her employment at her needle; and here she is in danger of falling in the hands of one of Mordent's profligate friends, who is himself accessory to the plot for carrying her off, at the moment that, the indefatigable zeal of Donald, who had traced her to this abode of infamy, she is discovered to be his daughter. The scenes which follow this discovery are highly interesting; and through the whole of the character of Mordent, the conflict between a sense of duty, pride, and dissipation, is portrayed with strong touches of truth and nature. Cheveril is a lively, amusing character, and represents with a good deal of risible effect, one of those careless, good-natured young fellows who would be thought "sad wicked dogs," but cannot prevail on themselves to do any harm.

Dorington, "The Man of Ten Thousand," may be considered a benevolent Timon. After living in the most splendid and profuse hospitality, he suddenly loses his immense wealth, and with it his friends; but he does not at the same time lose either his senses or his philosophy. He preserves, in the midst of the most mortifying reverses, the same calm dignity and evenness of mind. Great as this effort of heroism is, it is managed in such a manner as not to appear unnatural or extravagant. Olivia, his mistress, is by no means so interesting a character. She is the blemish of the picture. Her notions of virtue are too fastidious by half, and she exacts conformity to her standard of perfection with a dogmatical verity which would scarcely sit well on a Stoic. Neither is her behaviour explained to Dorington in so satisfactory a manner as ought to have been. The subordinate characters of Herbert and Annabel are described with extreme tenderness and simplicity. They exhibit an amiable picture of those qualities which spring directly from a guileless heart, without the artificial refinements of sentiment or reason. Hairbrain is a character of the same school, and must have had a very good effect in the hands of Bannister, who played it. Kemble and Miss Farren were representatives of Dorington and Olivia.

"Knave or Not," as well as "The Man of Ten Thousand," brought out at Drury Lane. Its success was not very flattering. The advertisement prefixed by the author to the published play will explain some of the reasons of this, as well as describe the most striking features of the play itself.

"The unrelenting opposition, which the productions of the author of the present comedy have experienced for several years, is well known to those who pay attention to our public amusements. It is not for him to pronounce how far this opposition has been merited by inability. Since the appearance of 'The Road to Ruin,' his comedy of 'The Deserted Daughter' only has escaped; and that, as he imagines, because it was not known on the first night of its performance by whom it was written. 'Love's Frailties,' 'The Man of Ten Thousand,' and 'Knave or Not,' have sustained increasing marks of hostility: so that the efforts made to afford rational amusement to the public, emolument to the author, and improvement to morals, have been rendered feeble, and almost ineffectual. In the last instance, one mistake appears to have pervaded the majority of the spectators. It was imagined that the author himself was as unqualified a libeller of mankind as Monrose: in which character the writer's individual sentiments were supposed to have been incorporated. Those who have read his other works cannot surely attribute to him any such indiscriminate misanthropy. The accusation that has been most generally made against him is, that he thinks men capable of gradations of virtue, which others affirm they can never attain. Persons, who have made the human mind their study, have discovered that guilty men exert the whole force of their faculties to justify their own course of action to themselves. To this principle the writer was strictly attentive in portraying the character of Monrose. His design was to draw a man of genius, misled by his passions, reasoning on his actions, systematising them, condemning them in principle, but justifying them in practice, and heating his imagination by contemplating the crimes of others; that he might still retain that respect for himself, of which the strongest minds, even in the last stages of vice, are so tenacious. How far that spirit of faction, commotion, and anarchy, of which the author has long been, and is still, so vehemently accused, is to be traced in the present comedy, may now be seen. Sincerely desirous of giving no offence, the passages which were most disapproved, or, to speak more accurately, reprobated, on the first night, have since been omitted in representation.

but they are printed between inverted commas, that the comment may decide whether the author could have been so actually to intend to inflame the spectators, and increase animosity between men of different sentiments: whom could he, he would account it the most heart-consoling action

"Before the comedy appeared, all parties were anxious that no sentence or word should be spoken which could be liable to misrepresentation. Some few passages, therefore, are common to the press which never were spoken on the stage: particular passage, where Monrose inquires into his qualifications as a lord. A few years ago, this would have been common satire; and it is a subject of no little regret, that at present and temporary applications are so liable to be made which are intended."

The jealousy which was thus manifested of sentiments, liberty or public virtue, was perhaps as inconsiderate as unjust. When the tragedy of "Cato" was first played, and when party zeal ran high, the Whigs applauded all the passages in the play, as a satire on the Tories; and they were as loud in their applause as the Whigs, to show that satire was unfelt. But the "horrors" of the French Revolution were, it seems, to become a Medusa's shield to screen every existing vice or folly from the glance even of ridicule, and render them invulnerable and incorrigible. To stickle for the abuses to which any system is liable is tacitly to support the system with the abuse.

In the characters of Susan and Jonas in this play, Mr. Garrick has been guilty of that common vice among the authors of the present day, of trusting less to the characters themselves than to the persons who were to act them. They were well adapted to the powers of acting in Mrs. Jordan, and Bannister, who probably make them amusing or interesting; but they stand in need of this foreign aid to produce such an effect.

"He's much to Blame" was acted at Covent Garden with great and deserved success. It is a truly elegant comedy. The characters, particularly that of Sir George Versa, are amusing and original; and the situations, which arise in the progress of the story, give birth to some of the most natural and delicate strokes of passion. The scene at the masquerade, when Maria is discovered by Sir George, is perhaps the most

the unaffected and artless expression of her feelings produces an effect which is irresistible. The easiness of Sir George's temper, and the facility with which he accommodates himself to other people's humours, without any design or hypocrisy, are admirably described. The passions are less strongly moved in this comedy than in "The Deserted Daughter," but they are moved with less effort, and with more pleasure to the reader. Neither has it any thing like the same bustle and broad effect as "The Road to Ruin:" but in ease, lightness, and a certain graceful simplicity, neither sinking into insipidity on the one hand, nor "o'erstepping the modesty of nature" on the other, it is superior to almost every other modern production. It is the finest specimen Mr. Holcroft has left of his powers for writing what is commonly understood by genteel comedy.

The comedy of "He's much to Blame" was offered to the theatre in the name of a friend; an artifice to which the author, notwithstanding his dislike to every species of insincerity, was obliged to resort more than once.

He informs us, in a short advertisement, that he was indebted for some hints in this play to "Le Complaisant," a French comedy, and "The Clavigo" of Goethe.

"The Inquisitor," brought out soon after at the Haymarket, and "The Old Clothesman," an after-piece, at Covent Garden, were unsuccessful.

CHAP. VI.

HAVING brought Mr. Holcroft's literary history down to the time when he left England, I shall throw together, in the present chapter, such private incidents as occurred within this period, and as have not been already noticed.

After the appearance of the comedy of "Duplicity," in 1782, Mr. Holcroft left his house in Southampton Buildings, and went to live in Marylebone Street. He afterwards hired a house, for a short time, in Margaret Street, in conjunction with his friend, Bonneville. In 1789, or the beginning of 1790, he removed into Newman Street, where he continued till a short time before his going abroad, in 1799, when he took lodgings in Beaumont Street, near the New Road.

In the year 1786, Mr. Holcroft first became acquainted with Mr. Godwin. This friendship lasted for near twenty years. It was broken off by an unhappy misunderstanding, some time after Mr. Holcroft's return from the continent; and they did not see each other, in consequence of the coolness that took place, till they met for the last time, a little before Mr. Holcroft's death.

It was Mr. Holcroft who reviewed Mr. Godwin's celebrated work on Political Justice, in the "Monthly Review," 1793. It may be supposed that the review was a favourable one. Mr. Holcroft, at this time, constantly wrote articles in the "Monthly Review," and was on friendly terms with Griffiths, the proprietor. But, it seems, the latter was considerably alarmed at the boldness of some of Mr. Godwin's principles, and still more staggered at the accounts he had heard of them. He threw himself on Mr. Holcroft's known attachment to the interest of the Review, not to commit its character by undeserved praise. Griffiths, however, probably found soon after that the common-place character of the Review had been endangered; and the first opportunity was seized to retrieve the mistake, by retracting their opinion hastily in the review of Mr. Malthus's publication.

The marriage of Mr. Holcroft's eldest daughter with Colonel Harwood took place in the year 1796.

Immediately after his release from prison, in 1794, he hurried into Devonshire to see his daughter (Sophy), whom he believed to be dying. His apprehensions, however, were groundless. While he remained in the country, he had a fall from a tree, which had nearly proved fatal to him, and which brought on an occasional palpitation of the heart, to which he was ever after subject, on using any sudden or violent exertion. Mr. Holcroft had, some years before, shortly after the appearance of "The Road to Ruin" been attacked by a paralytic affection, which he believed to have been the effect of too severe and constant application. Indeed when we recollect the number and variety of Mr. Holcroft's productions, it is evident that either his facility or industry must have been wonderful. Perhaps there is no instance of a man who passed through so much literary drudgery in voluminous translations, &c., and who was, at the same time, continually employed in the most lively efforts of the imagination. His resolute perseverance in pursuits so opposite, and apparently incompatible with each other, is a proof both of the activity and steadiness of his mind.

he relaxations in which Mr. Holcroft indulged were few and far. He was fond of riding, and for some years kept a horse, which had generally high blood in its veins. In 1787, he bought one of his father, which he valued so highly, that he refused to part with it for forty guineas. The French are not great equestrians; and Mr. Holcroft one day amused himself, rather maliciously, in making a friend from Paris mount this pony, who was extremely alarmed at the tricks he began to play, though he was very in no danger.

Mr. Holcroft also belonged to a musical club, of which Shield, Meneux, Crompton, Clementi, and Solomon were members. When this he afterwards withdrew, on account of the expense attending it.

His love for the arts sometimes subjected him to temptations which were not consistent with strict economy. He once gave a considerable sum of money for a couple of Cremona fiddles at one of which he afterwards presented to his friend Shield.

It may be supposed, that that part of Mr. Holcroft's time which he could spare from his studies, was chiefly devoted to the society of his friends. He, however, gave few dinner-parties, and those were not ostentatious, and consequently not expensive. When he dined with him, a bottle of wine was usually produced after dinner; but, with respect to himself, he was extremely abstemious in the use of liquor, and the habits of his friends were rather those of philosophers than Bacchanalians. A little story, which in mention of this subject has brought to my recollection, paints the characteristic simplicity of Mr. Holcroft's father in an amusing manner. Shortly after Mr. Godwin's first acquaintance with Holcroft, he was invited to dine with him one day, when the old gentleman was on a visit to his son. After dinner, Mr. Holcroft intended to go out of the room, and, during his absence, Mr. Godwin helped himself to a glass of wine. This was remarked as a grant breach of the rights of hospitality by the old man, and took the first opportunity to caution his son against Mr. Godwin as a very bad man; for that while he was out of the room, he, Godwin, had taken the bottle, and, without saying any thing, helped himself out a glass of wine." This laughable discovery had hardly have been made, if considerable care and economy were not generally characterised Mr. Holcroft's table. He seems, indeed, to have observed, through his whole life, the greatest moderation, even to a degree of parsimony, in his mode of living. The only extravagance with which he could reproach himself was the occasional gratification of that inordinate love which he bore for every thing connected with learning or the fine arts. A fine toned instrument, a curious book, or a masterly picture, were the baits which luxury always held out to him, and to which he soon times imprudently yielded. He once bought a complete set of the Fratres Poloni, though he did not understand the language which they wrote. Books and pictures were his chief articles of expense: the former he might think necessary to his own pursuit as an author, and the latter he looked upon as a lucrative speculation; for it is not to be supposed that he often bought pictures unless he considered them as a bargain. The worst of it was, that the ardour of his mind for whatever he engaged in, and that confidence in his own judgment which is common to men of strong feelings and active minds, too frequently deceived him. Among the purchases which Mr. Holcroft at this time made, was one which he supposed to be the original picture of Sion House painted by Wilson. He was eager to show this prize to his friends, and to one in particular, who expressed some doubt of its genuineness. To this Mr. Holcroft replied, by pointing to a touch in one part of the picture, which he said no copyist could imitate. A few days after, however, he came to the same friend and told him that he had been right in his conjecture, for that he had now got the real original, and that the other was but a copy. He afterwards sold the copy to Bannister for five guineas. His second purchase was a real Wilson, and one of the finest landscapes he ever painted.

Mr. Holcroft occasionally made excursions into different parts of England, and once or twice went to see his father, who still remained long in the same place. In 1788, he made a journey of this kind to visit him at Haslington, in Cheshire. Of the particulars of this journey, Mr. Holcroft has left an amusing sketch in his memorandum-book, which I shall here transcribe:—

“May 24th, 1788.—Received a letter from my father,—supposed him dying. Went immediately to take coach out on the 25th, in the Manchester Commercial Coach for Haslington. An ignorant Cambridge scholar, a boorish attorney, a pert, travelled officer, a vain, avaricious, rheumatic woman, and a loving young widow. Dined at Holkiff, in with outside passengers. Pride of inside ones. Tea at Chapel Brompton. A sandwich at Lutterworth. Widow leaves the coach. Quaker taken up at Hinckliff; but four and twenty; conceived himself a wit; rude to the old woman. Breakfast at Litchfield. Resign my place to a distressed damsel, and ride outside to Stafford. Cankwood coal-pits. Village of Slade. Remembrance of former times; youthful distresses; ass and coals blown down; white bread of Rugely; pottery journeys, &c. Pleasant banks of the Trent. Various seats, parks, pleasure grounds, &c. Quaker takes his glass at Stafford; becomes more talkative and rude, which he supposes witty; is told he is carnally inclined, and becomes suddenly abashed. Such is the force of habit and education. Lose the lawyer. Dine at Newcastle. Quaker listens to learned poetical discourse on unities, Shakspeare, Molière, Boileau, Pope, Gresset, Rousseau, Voltaire, Milton, &c., in raptures. Old woman displays her whole stock of great discernment, i. e. vanity. Stop at Talk. Waggon blown up; concussion felt several miles. Ostler of Talk o' the Hill going to see his sweetheart; drove down the hill for the waggoner; smith at work saw the gunpowder running out, and called to lock the wheel, or the waggon would be blown up. Was not heard, or it was impossible to stop the waggon. Horse's shoe supposed to have struck fire, and caught the train. Body of the ostler dismembered, and blown, with one of the horses, through the wall of a house; his leg and arm found, some days after, under the rubbish of a blown-down wall. All the horses killed. Many women and children killed, others maimed; the glass of the windows shivered into their faces and breasts; their shrieks terrible. Deep sands of Cheshire. New-built village of Wheelock, between Haslington and Sandbach. Joy at finding my father in no danger. Simple hospitality of farmer Owen. News of my arrival spread through the village. Bashful, boorish curiosity. Village scandal. Informed of the character of each individual; one accused of pride, another of selfishness, drunkenness, &c. A brutal, broken butcher, who had spent a good fortune, the pest and terror of the place. Runs naked at prison-bars in Crewe Park; is horse-whipped by the squire's order. Informs against his brother Fox and farmer Owen; confuted, and punished for having killed hares himself, though unable to substantiate his own charge. Maims cattle, &c. Is the terror of my father. Tricks of my father's landlord. Promises portions with his daughters, and, when married, tells the husbands he will pay them the interest. Clerk of the parish, the barber, cobbler, ostler, and musician of the village. Lady's maid, returned from her travels, visits the village and her friends; speaks gibberish; is reported to understand languages better than myself. Psalm-singing vanity of the clerk humbled. Village ideas of London. Cheshire dairies. Excursion to Crewe Cottage. Poetic ideas. Returned to write down some lines, nearly extempore. Crewe and Sheridan. The first a great man among the neighbouring boors, and his own footmen; the latter in the House of Commons, among the first men in the nation, or in the world. Welsh manners. Red woollen shirts. Sunday mirth. The women till the earth, the men sit and smoke. Goat's milk rich. Went to Nantwich. Inscription on a house curiously built: 'Thomas Clease made this house in the XVIII yeare of the reane of our noble Queene Elezabeth.' Thomas Holcroft, a white-cooper, at Boscow, near Ormskirk. Richard Fairhurst, farmer in the same neighbourhood, my father's first cousin. Dobson, his uncle. My father born on Martin's Muir, removed to Sheepcote Hills, went to school at Rudderford."

Mr. Holcroft's father lived in the latter part of his life near Knutsford, where he had married again. Mr. Holcroft allowed him 20*l.* per annum, which, with a little shop and garden that he kept, maintained him comfortably. He allowed 12*l.* a year to his widow after his death, which happened in 1797. A tombstone was erected to his memory, by his son's desire, with the following inscription:—"Here lies the body of Thomas Holcroft, who departed this life 1797, aged eighty. He was a careful father, a kind husband, and an honest man." He was buried in Peavor churchyard, near Knutsford.

Mr. Holcroft's affairs soon after became considerably involved, partly through the failure of the polygraphic scheme in which he had foolishly embarked several hundred pounds; but chiefly from a run of ill fortune at the theatre. He was obliged to sell his effects, books, and pictures. These it may be supposed did not fetch near their value; and the parting with the two last, particularly his books, Mr. Holcroft felt almost as the severing of a limb from the body. His plan was to retire to the continent, both for the sake of economy, and with a view to establish a literary correspondence, and send over translations of such works as it might be advantageous either to the theatres or the booksellers to accept. Mr.

left England for Hamburgh in May, 1799. Whether it was at a man who had unremittingly devoted his whole life and philosophical pursuits, who had contributed highly to the amusement, who had never entered into the intrigues and feelings of any party, and whose principles necessarily made him an inoffensive and peaceable member of society, whose was the good of mankind, and whose only weapon for proving was reason ; whether it was just that such a man should be a victim of political prejudice, and because he had been the subject of a false accusation, should be exposed to persecution afterwards from those who seemed to think that the injury he had suffered could only be expiated by repeated insult, on which may at least admit of doubt in the minds of thinking persons.

Mr. Holcroft left England, he married Louisa, the daughter of his friend Mercier. Of his marriage with this lady, I have to say more at present, than that Mr. Holcroft found happiness in it which he had promised himself from a young, sensible, accomplished, and affectionate wife.

CHAP. VII.

Part of our author's life which includes the last two years in England before his going abroad, I am enabled to give a more satisfactory account from his own papers. Almost the whole of this time he kept a diary ; and though it is not filled with great events, or striking reverses of fortune, it exhibits a perfect picture of the life, habits, and amusements of a literary man. It is my wish to bring the reader acquainted as I can with the subject of these memoirs ; and the best way of doing this, than by exhibiting in his own words every thought or circumstance which passed through his mind during the above period. From hence we may form some idea of his rest. This diary will occupy a very disproportionate share of the rest of the work ; but if it should be found tedious, I am assured I erred grievously in judgment. There are some persons whose original which are omitted ; and others which may be thought improper. But I believe no greater liberties are taken with the names of living characters than are to be found in "Boswell's Life of Johnson," and other sources of literary anecdote.

Mr. Holcroft began his diary in June, 1798. — It is as follows : —

"I have long felt a desire to keep memorandums of the common occurrences of life, and have now made a determination, which I think will not easily be shaken, to keep a

"DIARY.—1798.

"June 22nd. — Called on Mr. Armstrong, relative to my disease ; advises me to take oil of almonds, and rhubarb. Called on Mr. Shield ; saw him : on Mr. and Mrs. Opie : both ill. Wrote to Mr. Reynolds, bookseller, to settle the account ; wrote to Mr. Colman, who called when I was out. Went to Debrett's : the opinion of Mr. Weld is, that the force sent over by government will be sufficient to quell the Irish insurrection for the present : believes Dundas averse to the coercion used in that country, and to the Beresfords, &c. R. Ad—— says, Windham out of the house rails at the Irish system, that Lord Fitz——, the D—— D——, &c. are averse to it ; that the D—— P—— is for it, as well as that part of the cabinet called the King's friends. Professor Porson dined with me ; made, as usual, numerous amusing quotations, and, among the rest, cited the following passage from Middleton's preface, as one of the most manly, beautiful, and full of genius that he had ever read :—'I persuade myself that the life and faculties of man, at the best but short and limited, cannot be employed more rationally or laudably than in the search of knowledge ; and especially of that sort which relates to our duty, and conduces to our happiness. In these inquiries, therefore, wherever I perceive any glimmering of truth before me, I readily pursue and endeavour to trace it to its source, without any reserve or caution of pushing the discovery too far, or opening too great a glare of it to the public. I look upon the discovery of any thing which is true as a valuable acquisition to society ; which cannot possibly hurt or obstruct the good effect of any other truth whatsoever ; for they all partake of one common essence, and necessarily coincide with each other ; and like the drops of rain, which fall separately into the river, mix themselves at once with the stream, and strengthen the general current.' It is indeed a noble and admirable passage. Porson maintained that men are by nature and of necessity inferior to men ; and that tipping is beneficial to youth : on both which points I, to a very considerable degree, differed with him ; but we rather declared an opinion, than argued a question. Having drunk about a pint of wine, he refused any more ; which determination I was pleased to see. Mentioned the letters to Travis, and the orgies of Bacchus. Noted Foote (Smirk in 'The Minor'), and spoke of him, as he well serves, with rapture. Went in the evening to the billiard table, but did not play. I go for exercise, because I find that walking without a motive wearies, not recruits, the spirits ; but my rule is never to play for more than a shilling, and never to bet, as I hold gaming to be a detestable vice. I am obliged to play for something in compliance with the custom. Returned, and read a few pages of Pennant's 'Tour in Scotland,' which I began this day.

"23rd. — Wrote a scene in 'Old Clothesman ;' walked to see Mr. Godwin ; conversed of my disease ; he wished me to consult a physician. Returned ; wrote a letter to Mrs. Jordan, in behalf of Mr. Watts. Conversed with Mr. Webb at Debrett's, on the moral progress of mankind. Returned and saw Mr. Colman, from whom I now first learnt that the prologue and epilogue to 'The Inquisitor,' were written without my knowledge, and to be played this very night, were written by the prompter, Mr. Waldron. Accompanied Fanny to lessons, and went to billiards, played about a dozen games ; felt internal pains that warned me ; felt my pulse, and found it extremely quick ; left off immediately ; applied my thoughts to calm the arterial action ; walked gently home ; giddy, and considerably affected ; took medicine, and went to bed. Soon after received accounts, that 'The Inquisitor' was in part highly disapproved of and ridiculed. Mr. — was of opinion that the story, notwithstanding, made a considerable impression upon the audience, which was considered as an impartial one ; and that, on the whole, the feelings of the people were more for than against the play. In the course of the day, read more of Pennant ; the facts he collects are useful, and some of them curious ; but his manner is disjointed, confused, and therefore dull.

"24th. — Worked about an hour at my opera ('Old Clothesman') . Read Pennant — Went to Colman, who seems fearful I should wish him to play 'The Inquisitor' to his own disadvantage. Agreed to omit certain passages the next night : when he first read the play, his opinion was warmly in its favour ; he then thought it perfectly safe. The ludicrous reception it met with from audience has changed his opinion. I have found the same produced on others, on various occasions. My opinion is was not the play which occasioned the laughter, but the man performing it, aided by the gratification which the flippant criticism finds in flattering its own discrimination and superciliousness. The play will be printed with the passages retained (except which is trifling), that the reader of it may judge how far it is itself calculated to produce, or to deserve laughter. Our theatre at present (and, from its smallness, this theatre in particular) half filled with prostitutes and their paramours: they disturb the rest of the audience; and the author, and common sense, is a sport of their caprice and profligacy. Met Perry for the first time since his release from Newgate; then Dr. Moore, who showed me the list of the special jury summoned to try Cuthell, or Jones, for publishing Wakefield's pamphlet. — Dined, Godwin and present. Godwin mentioned a Mr. —, whom he and Mr. Fawcett*, on a pedestrian ramble, went to visit at Ipswich: Godwin saying, that perhaps he would give them beds; if not, he would ask them to supper, and besides they should have the pleasure of seeing the beautiful Cicely, his daughter. They went, for some time, but received no invitation. When they came home, Mr. Fawcett said he had three questions to ask Mr. Godwin: How he liked his supper, how he liked his bed, and how he liked Miss Cicely (who had not appeared)? This occasioned me to remark, that the fault was probably not in the host, but in the hypocrisy of our manners; and that they ought to have free

* The late Rev. Joseph Fawcett, author of the "Art of War," &c. who he delivered the Sunday evening lectures at the Old Jewry, which were popular about twenty years ago. He afterwards retired to Hedgegrove in Dorsetshire. It was here that I first became acquainted with him, and some of the pleasantest days of my life. He was the friend of my early years. He was the first person of literary eminence, whom I had then known; and the conversations I had with him on subjects of taste and philosophy (for he was as refined as his powers of reasoning were profound and subtle) gave me a delight, such as I can never feel again.

The writings of Sterne, Fielding, Cervantes, Richardson, Rousseau, Goethe, &c., were the usual subjects of our discourse, and the pleasure I had, in reading these authors, seemed more than doubled. Of all the people I have ever known, he was the most perfectly free from every taint of jealousy or narrowness. Never did a mean or sinister motive come near his heart. He was one of the most enthusiastic admirers of the French Revolution; and I believe the disappointment of the hopes he had cherished of the freedom and happiness of mankind, preyed upon his mind and hastened his death.—Ed.

ly wanted a supper, beds, and to see Miss Cicely. Spoke to Mr. — on the morality of eating animal food : he said we had no right to kill animals, and diminish the quantity of sensation. I answered that the quantity of sensation was greatly increased ; for that the number of living animals was increased, perhaps ten, perhaps a hundred fold, by the care which man bestowed on them ; and that as I saw no reason to suppose they meditated on, or had any fore-knowledge of, death the pain of dying to them is scarcely worth mentioning. I ought however to have added, that the habit of putting them to death probably injures that class of men (hunters) whose office it is, and that they communicate the injury to society. This evil, I think, might be greatly remedied. My son joined our party in the evening.

25th. — Took my medicine as usual. Sent orders to Marshall, and others. Read the papers at Debrett's : they were uniform in crying 'The Inquisitor.' One critic, whom I believe to be a man of taste and candour, accused it of fustian, and various other vile effects. — Went to Tattersall's — the usual group there of horse-sellers, jockeys, and gentlemen : played three games at billiards, Sherrard Street. — Saw Mr. S —, who thought but indifferently of 'The Inquisitor ;' alleging however, that he could not hear, &c. Went to Colman, at the theatre, 'The Inquisitor' then performed ; to the satisfaction of the audience ; he therefore agreed to play the next night ; but was anxious, if the house was thin, that it should be laid aside. We agreed to wait the event, and confer on Wednesday. Returned. Mr. S — came to me from the play-house, to inform me that the piece had, on this second performance, been well received ; that the actors, who played vilely the first night, were greatly improved, and that his opinion of it was very much changed.

26th. — Went to Paternoster-row ; conferred with Robinson on publishing 'The Inquisitor.' He promised to consider the proposals I had made, concerning the sale of the whole of my copyrights. Returned, and sent 'The Inquisitor' to press. Went to my son's sale — bought the Bible in Welsh, Polish, Danish, and English : likewise Novelle di Salernitano (scarce) and other books. Saw D'Israeli there, and Rogers, the poet, but did not notice the latter. Went to Debrett's : numbers there, Lords Townshend, Annet, &c. Messrs. Francis, St. John, &c. The expedition of naparte, and the news of the defeat of the Irish at Wexford, the chief topics. The Irish, it was supposed, must for the p be quelled. Met Perry, and conversed with him on 'Tl quisitor;' blamed by him for writing too fast. Called at in the evening; sat near two hours. — Much difference of sen between us, but little or no ill-humour.

"27th. — Read Pennant, and Bower's 'Life of Pope Alex the Sixth.' The general system of morals at that time in must have been wretchedly depraved; or this pope, and his but wicked son, Cæsar Borgia, might have been admirabl racters. They seem but to have excelled their contempora wickedness. Saw Parson — at Debrett's, who describ sandy roads of the north of Germany as invariably heavy an A nobleman, who travelled post, was eighteen days in go Vienna, a journey of little more than 400 English miles. — F the wines of Hungary as the best in the world: those of th mon inns in Germany as very bad. I read the three g relative to Irish affairs, the defeat of the insurgents, the capt Wexford, the haughty answer of Lake to the terms propose the evacuation of part of St. Domingo by the British troops. turned to meet Colman, who broke his appointment. W him. Accompanied Fanny in a lesson after dinner. Mr. veiller played chess, and drank tea with us.

"28th. — Considered my opera, but did not write. Read M ton's dedication and preface to 'Life of Cicero;' a man commonly sound head and heart. Walked to Debrett's; n stirring. Colman came to me. The third night of the under-charges: promises, if he can, to perform it again wi new farce, that is, if the farce brings money. Played a less Fanny after dinner. Visited Mr. Geiseveiller, and met the —, chaplain to the Austrian embassy, and Mr. —, an emi native of Brussels. The Doctor had the most literature, b emigrant the most logic. The Doctor is a chemist, known t Nicholson, who, the Doctor says, has written the best ch book in our language, meaning his 'First Elements.' They reasoned on the expedition of Buonaparte, and both seemed in to think him gone to the East Indies, either up the Red Se from thence across the Little Desert and by sea to the Carna down the Euphrates into the Persian Gulph, &c. Both wer vinced it could be no such trifling object as the capture of l or any Mediterranean island. The blow, they supposed, w ditated against the whole of the power of England in India. The Doctor thinks with me, that Kant, who is at present so much admired in Germany, is little better than a jargonist. Returned; made some good notes for the character of Morgan (in 'The Old Clothesman'), and went to bed; but my imagination being awakened, I could not get to sleep till nearly one o'clock.

"29th. — Worked at my opera. — At Debrett's, — Conjectures were made on Buonaparte's expedition, and the difficulties attending it. Weld of opinion that he would cross the Great Desert, as the least difficult. The transportation of artillery, ammunition, cavalry, &c. over this tract, supposed by Mr. Godfrey to be impracticable. The march of Alexander was of a very different kind. Walked with the two Parrys, who were stopped by O'Bryan and Maxwell concerning Fenwick's publication. The Bow Street people, on a late trial, were affirmed to have perjured themselves. Ford was supposed by O'Bryan to have been exempt from this guilt. It was allowed he had behaved kindly to Arthur, but not uprightly in court. For my own part, I know nothing of these matters.

"30th. — Went, after breakfast, to Mr. Stoddart, but did not go in. Met Opie on my return. Thought myself recovering strength and activity apace. Sent into the city for proofs of the play, which were brought back. Corrected them. Wrote notes for a short preface. Received 17l. 16s. 10d. for my mare, which was knocked down on Wednesday for nineteen guineas at Aldridge's. In the course of this day's business, about two o'clock, leaning the pit of my stomach hastily over the edge of a desk, I was again seized with excruciating pains in my stomach; cold sweats and debility immediately followed, though the fit was, I believe, the least violent of the four that I have now had. When it was somewhat assuaged, I was under the necessity of writing my short preface, my second note to W., and of correcting more proof sheets.

"July 1st. — Read Boswell's 'Life of Johnson:' the writer weak, vain, a sycophant, overflowing with worldly cunning: yet, owing to the industry with which he collected his materials, the book abounds in facts, and is amusing.

"2nd. — Went to Mr. S., paid him the hundred pound bill on Mr. Harris, at six months, and received the balance: all accounts clear between him and me. Worked at my opera. Wrote Scenes 8 and 9, as far as 'Do you hear how lottery tickets sell?' Satisfied, at present, with my alterations in the character of Morgan. Read the last proof of 'The Inquisitor.' Read Boswell after dinner. Visited by Messrs. Watts and B., and Mrs. Revely. Music, Mozart and Haydn, till ten, Fanny the principal performer. I retired to rest in some pain, which increased in bed: dreamed that my body was severed above the hips, and again joined in a surprising manner; astonished to think I was alive; afraid of being struck or run against, lest the parts should be dis-severed. Very angry at the thoughtlessness of a boy that gave me a blow, and again surprised that it had no ill consequences. This dream appears to be the result of the pain, and the waking thoughts I have had on the probabilities of life or death.

"3rd. — Wrote to the Rev. G. Smith, under frank given me by Lord Thanel, containing two bank notes, value six pounds, for my father's widow. Worked at my opera a very short time. Informed by Mr. Weld, that Dr. Pitcairne had been cured of my complaint. Characterised him as our ablest physician since the death of Warren. Related that the Doctor and Sir George Baker were present in Warren's last moments; that Sir George wished Warren to take an opiate, which he refused. Sir George desired him to give his reasons, and Warren, turning to the Doctor, said, 'Tell Baker why I ought not to take an opiate to day.' Immediately after which he clapped his hand to his breast and exclaimed, 'It is come again!' then presently expired. Read the Reviews and 'Monthly Magazine.' In the evening called at Opie's: they not returned from Southgate! Sat with Mr. Nicholson till ten. One game at chess: conversed of my disease; of the present vicious enunciation of thought, and its evils to society: of a universal character which Nicholson is persuaded must soon be invented, and come into general use: he himself inclined to execute the task, which he does not consider as very difficult: of Bramhead at Devonshire House, and Arkwright: of Tooke, and the misapplication of his powers, the sacrifice of wisdom and virtue to the pitiful triumph of the moment.

"4th. — Sent in Shepperson and Reynold's account, the balance 24*l.* 4*s.* in my favour. Worked an hour or better at my opera. No news at Debrett's, except Buonaparte said to have taken Malta.

"5th. — Reading Boswell's 'Life of Johnson' at breakfast, was highly gratified by the following assertion of Johnson: 'I find myself under the necessity of observing that this learned and judicious writer (Lord Kaimes) has not accurately distinguished the

iciencies and demands of the different conditions of human life ;
 b, from a degree of savageness and independence, in which all are vain, passes, or may pass, by innumerable gradations, to te of reciprocal benignity in which laws shall be no longer ne-rry.' Visited Carlisle, profuse in his display of chirurgical vledge, an acute and thinking mind, disliking contradiction, cious of system, and generally systematizing : thought the l ought not to endeavour to regulate disease, its influence g great, but, as he affirmed, prejudicial. Instanced that peoaving wounds, by a close attention to their feelings in the ted part, increased its sensibility to a noxious degree ; and the bones which, he said (I think erroneously), have them-
 s no feeling, had, by the attention of patients, fixed upon them a diseased, become entirely sensitive. He spoke of these as within his own knowledge. From my own experience I be-them to be true, and think with him, that the attention so upon parts diseased, may be prejudicial ; but, from exnents made upon myself, if the attention be fixed with a tranpacifying, and cheerful temper of mind, I am persuaded they ly benefit the sufferer. This I urged ; but his opinion seemed .. Advised me to consult Pitcairne, but did not lead me to , either from himself or others, any degree of medical know-e that should be efficient. What is called nature, that is, the ges that are continually taking place, is trusted to as the operator. Received the third volume of Ireland's 'Hogarth treated.' Clementi dined with us.

3th. — Read 'Hogarth,' J. Ireland, vol. iii. Some valuable mation, but wretchedly put together. Hogarth too irascible, pushing his favourite points to extremes : a man of uncommon as, and though highly admired by some, most unjustly treated thers. If it be true, which I doubt, that he did not excel in igher parts of his art, i. e. in the beautiful and sublime, what as written, and what he has done, sufficiently prove it was want of power, but want of practice. He felt his wrongs too gnantly, and, in resenting them, wanted liberality. Manners undergoing a great change ; and though just at present, an erant and acrimonious spirit prevails, yet there is much less edness, asperity, and undisguised insult, than there was in ime. Saw B. at Debrett's : the health of Porson precarious.
 d at Opie's ; he gone to see Hogarth's 'March to Finchley'

7th. — Gillies, B., S., called before dinner. Worked nearly an hour at the opera: the scene of Frank and Morgan for and against speculation; but as I grew warm with the subject, felt pain similar to preceding sensations, which warned me to desist. Read Middleton's 'Life of Cicero,' and the pain went. Reports of the day, that Buonaparte and four or five sail of the line are taken: but disbelieved at Lloyd's: and that the insurgents in Wicklow have surprised and totally cut off the 'Ancient Britons,' a corps hated by the Irish for the mischief done them. Affairs of Boyd and Benfield deranged; both, it is said, from mean beginnings, had attained the utmost splendour of wealth. Boyd had been successively the chief money dealer in France at the commencement of the Revolution; then in England, and for the emperor: something like the cashier of Europe; compared to Law for enterprise and capacity, and for proving the facility of an impossible scheme. Read Boswell's 'Life of Johnson' after dinner.

8th. — My spirits more cheerful, and my strength increasing. Read Boswell's 'Life of Johnson;' practised a little music. Purcell, a flowing, impassioned composer—his harmonies original, yet natural; and his melodies the best of his day. Is it true, Boswell affirms, that Corelli came to England to visit him, and that Purcell being dead, Corelli immediately returned? Dr Foulkes, before dinner, gave me an account of Coigley, as was previous to his trial, as when sentence was passed, and at the place of execution; his sentiments generous, his mind undaunted and his behaviour heroic. Mr. Godwin's conversation, as usual, was acute, and his ideas comprehensive.

9th. — Read Boswell. Wrote notes for the opera, with 'Old Clothes to Sell,' and other alterations and additions to the first exit of Morgan. Dined with Phillips ('Monthly Magazine' present F. the Cambridge man, Signor Damiani, Dr. G. Pinkerton ('Heron's Letters'), and S.; the three last, Scotch S. rattled, but had read and remembered. Pinkerton a little. The Doctor rather fond of dull stories; a man of information, irascible, and pertinacious. Maintained that a man who, following the common path through an orchard, apples, put them in his pocket, and left a shilling for the house of the owner, committed so heinous an offence, might justly have been shot as a robber. He scoffed at the ment and possibility of the apples being more necessary happiness of the man who took them than of the legal owner. The argument is indeed hypothetical, and should be cautiously admitted. He treated the plea of benevolence, in the depredator's behalf, with equal contempt; and affirmed he did not argue as a lawyer, but from principles of indubitable justice. I was his chief opponent, and for a moment caught some of his heat and obstinacy. One of his stories was of a Romish priest, who sent up to town to Coghlan, a Catholic bookseller, for three hundred asparagus, which the man mistook for Asperges, an instrument used to sprinkle holy water with. The joke was the bookseller's distress at not being able to procure more than forty or fifty in the time, and promising the rest. I forgot to mention Mr. B., a teacher, who informed us the wife of Petion* remains still persuaded that her husband is not dead, and that he will again appear as soon as he can with safety. I related that Petion, when in England, had once dined with me, that he was so full of his own oratory, as to turn his back to the mantel-piece, as soon as he came in, and make a speech, which lasted till the dinner was on table; that as soon as eating gave him leave, he again harangued, and would with difficulty suffer himself to be interrupted, till he took his leave; and that, for my own part, I saw no marks of a man of great abilities, to which B. assented. George Dyer came in after dinner. Except myself, I have reason to believe that all the persons at table have been occasional writers for the 'Monthly Magazine.' I walked slowly, and fed cautiously. The foolish question of whether the next century will begin the first of January, 1800, or 1801, was mentioned by F. with as much pleasure as his imagination seems capable of; for he had been present at two sumptuous dinners, and was likely to enjoy several others. He revelled in the idea of disputes which produced wagers of eating and drinking, said they were very proper, and the more uncertain and confused the better. He, as a mathematician, had been appealed to, and had decided in favour of the year 1800. Geddes remarked that there were pamphlets which showed the same question was agitated at the beginning of the last century. 'To be sure,' said F., 'it always will be a ques-

* He was the first President of the National Convention in France. Having excited the jealousy of Robespierre, he was included in the proscription of the Girondists, May, 1793; but he made his escape to the department of Calvados, and soon afterwards his body was found in a field, half devoured, as was supposed, by wolves.

tion, and it is fit it should be.' Geddes was still more incomprehensible; for, if I understood him, the century begins with the year 99. I asked him to explain; he said he could only do it by a diagram; but added, that after Christ was born, the year I was not completed till he was one year old; to which I answered, this I believed nobody would dispute. As I found they either did not understand themselves, or at least were unintelligible to me, I dropped the question.

"10th. — Left my card for C. — Mr. B. called. Has adopted the cant which from Germany has spread to England, of affirming Mozart to be a greater man than Haydn. In Germany, his theatrical pieces have given Mozart his great popularity; he was undoubtedly a man of uncommon genius, but not a Haydn. His life indeed was too short. Stoddart left his translation of 'Don Carlos.' He has executed his task reputably; the fourth and fifth acts of the play are greatly confused. The first interview of Philip II. and the Marquis of Posa, is a masterly scene. The whole is unequal; in some parts, feeble; in others, tedious; and yet a performance of which none but a man of genius could be capable. It reminds the reader of 'Hamlet' and 'Othello,' and of various passages in Shakspeare.

"11th. — Read Boswell. Handel returned from the binders. Wrote Act i. of the opera, but had some notes. Heard at Debrett's that when Pitt went to the levee, after his illness and duel, the king shook him by the hand, a thing unprecedented, and violating etiquette.

"12th. — Called on C. He supposes electricity and the human will to be the same; gave high praise to Count Rumford's experiments on heat. His imagination luxuriant, incautious, and daring. Dalrymple and the most scientific geographers, whom he met at the house of Sir Joseph Banks, are convinced of the practicability of conveying armies to India, by the way of Cairo, Suez, &c. This supposed scheme of the French still continues to be the common-place gossip of the day. Revised and copied part of Scene 18. Dr. Black said at Debrett's, that Father le Roche was hanged twice, the rope breaking when he was half strangled, and that he cursed and swore violently at being so treated. Met G. and O. at Geiseveiller's. G. characterised Laudohn as a practical rather than theoretical general; and Lacy as the reverse. Said Laudohn was a severe and despotic disciplinarian.

n ; instanced a colonel, at the attack of Novi, whose regiment was engaged, and he behind. Laudohn coming up, asked him if it was his proper place, and commanded him immediately to step forward and head his regiment. The colonel obeyed. Laudohn, however, passing the same regiment some time after, again found the colonel in the rear ; and not waiting for any court-martial, or even a trial, shot him through the head. On another occasion, during the war with the Turks, he sent orders to General Clairfait, who commanded a corps about thirty miles distant, to attack the enemy. Clairfait, a man of skill and courage, considered the superior numbers of the enemy, and their strong position, and despaired ; but immediately despatched a letter stating his reasons. Laudohn read the letter in presence of the officer who brought it ; he tore it, and threw it on the ground. The officer asked, with some surprise, what answer he was to take back. Laudohn replied, ' You have witnessed my answer.' The officer returned, stated what had passed, and Clairfait immediately attacked the Turks, whom he routed. Laudohn when not in the field, nor employed in military duties, lived silent, reserved, and penuriously. At the beginning of the Turkish war, Lacy and others were employed ; and the emperor, according to G., lost the greatest part of an army composed of 200,000 men. Laudohn was at length sent as commander-in-chief ; and the moment he was thus employed, he became cheerful, pleasant, and generous ; and in about a year, so frequently triumphed over the Turks, that he compelled them to make peace. During the public rejoicings on one of these victories, at Vienna, his name was emblazoned and repeated in a variety of ways ; and the Emperor Joseph II. talking with Marshal Lacy to see the illuminations, said to the marshal, ' My dear marshal, they don't mention a word of you or me.' After the peace of Teschen, Frederick II., Joseph, and the generals in chief, dined together ; and it was remarked, that whenever Frederick addressed Lacy, or the other Austrian field-marshal, he never gave them that title, but said Monsieur Lacy, &c. ; and when he addressed Laudohn, who had not been honoured with that rank, he always called him Field-Marshal Laudohn. The emperor understood the reproof ; and a few weeks afterwards created him a field-marshal. These particulars were told by

I do not know whether they are common stories ; but they agree with the character of Laudohn, and are probably true.

When G. went, I conversed with O. on Shakspeare, he had no great opinion. Corneille, Racine, Crebillon taire, he supposed the most perfect writers of trag held verse, that is, rhyme, to be essential to the French and urged the hexameters of Greece and Rome, and English verse. He was unwilling to allow it was much more when the tone of passion is raised, for men to speak in blank verse than in rhyme, or in alexandrines. I affirmed, they more easily speak in the blank verse of Shakspeare, reality is only an harmonious and measured prose. P. at when he had done with lords and M. P.'s., spoke to many factors are beginning to speculate on a bad harvest. At sat half an hour at Opie's. G. Dyer there.

"14th. — Saw in the newspaper another of Garat's speech in the court of Naples. Read one yesterday, which, for its bombast and foppery, was highly ridiculous. Garat compares France to ancient republics; and says she imitates them in sending philosophers and philosophers (himself one) to kings and subjugated lands. There is something extremely offensive in vapouring of this great nation, or, rather, of the person upon whom they put to govern and be the mouthpiece of the nation, certainly has the character of grandeur, both of virtue and power, but which yet has a strange propensity, in certain points, to render itself contemptible.

"15th. — Sir William Beechey*, with his young son, called lately knighted. Speaks best on painting, the subject on which chiefly conversed: said that a notion prevailed in Italy of pictures having a brown tone, had most the hue of Titian; that the picture-dealers of Italy smeared them over with some brown which communicates this tone; and added that my Castigean picture had been so smeared. Of this I doubt. Repeated conversation, at which he was present, when Burke endeavoured to persuade Sir Joshua Reynolds to alter his picture of the dying Marston, by taking away the devil, which Burke said was an ridiculous incident, and a disgrace to the artist. Sir Joshua said that if Mr. Burke thought proper, he could argue as well for the other side; and Burke asked if he supposed him so unprincipled as to speak from any thing but conviction? No, said Sir Joshua, had you happened to take the other side, you could have with equal force. Burke again urged him to obliterate this blemish, saying Sir Joshua had heard his arguments (which Beechey did not repeat), and desired to know if he could answer them. Sir Joshua replied, it was a thought he had conceived and executed to the satisfaction of himself and many others; and having placed the devil there, there he should remain. Beechey praised my portrait, painted by Opie; but said the colouring was too foxy; allowed Opie great merit, especially in his picture of crowning Henry VI. at Paris; agreed with me that he had a bold and determined mind, and that he nearest approached the fine colouring of Rembrandt. Spoke in high terms of a picture by Fuseli for Comus, the subject (if I understood him) the entrance of the brothers to the release of the lady; and also of a landscape now painting by Sir F. Bourgeois.* Played chess with Mr. Du Val. Conceived three scenes for the opera, and sketched two of them: one was suggested by hearing a man and woman wrangle.

* The eminent portrait painter. He died in 1839, at the age of 70.

"16th.—Mr. Pinkerton called, wishes me to read a manuscript tragedy written by himself. Wolcott lodges near him at Hampstead. P. formerly attacked Stevens in his 'Heron's Letters,' therefore they are not acquainted. Stevens quarrelled with the Hampstead Stage several years ago for not having kept him a place, declared he would not ride in it again. has kept his word, and daily walks to town at seven in the morning, and returns to dinner at three in the afternoon; keeps no company, except that he has an annual miser's dinner, that is, a very sumptuous one. P. is now forty, reads much at the British Museum, which is four miles all but a quarter from his house, and is an hour all but five minutes regularly in walking that distance. Nothing at Debrett's. Mr. Godwin returned the first act of the opera with remarks, dictated evidently by the fear, that ill-success will attend me in future, as it has in some late attempts. The strongest minds cannot shake off the influence which the opinion of a multitude produces. Louisa Mercier dined with us. Read Boswell. Still the same loquacious parasite: to whom we are highly indebted for the facts he has preserved relative to Johnson, and I had almost said for the laughter he has excited at himself. He is, indeed, a most solemn, pompous, and important coxcomb. I never was in his company, but have frequently seen him in the streets. His grave strut and elevated head, with peculiar self-important set of his face, entirely corresponded with character he unintentionally draws of himself in his writing

* He died in 1811, bequeathing his admirable collection of pictures to Dulwich College, besides 10,000*l.* for building a gallery there, and keeping the pictures in preservation.

"17th.—Read Boswell. The French at Turin: their th dominion insatiable. It is a duty to calculate what will moral consequences of their vicious actions. I am sorry I had the time (most men have more or less the abilities) for such calculations. Met Mr. Marshal, who did not much like 'The Inquisitor' on the stage. Told me Robinson lamented, in a friendly manner, that I was not more careful of my fame. Perhaps I am mistaken; but though 'The Inquisitor' was certainly no more than a trifling effort, I still do not think it a contemptible one. The audience, Marshal says, were but little attentive to the story. Surely it was the fault of the performers. But the piece is printed, and I am partial, will detect my folly. The topic at Debrett's was the two Sheares's, who have been executed for treason in 1796. They were brothers, both in the law, but had little practice, and in 1793 of their open and passionate declarations against government in Paris during some epoch of great conflict, mounted guard, wore the red cap, &c. as many or most other of the English did for their own safety, and are the sons of a wealthy banker, who I hear was member for the city of Cork. In the course of the evening I walked to Mr. Godwin's, King's, Covent Garden, Debrett (after three games of chess in the evening) up Oxford Road, and back to the billiard-table with Mr. Geiseveiller, in all nine miles, after which I played sixteen games at billiards. I had I confided too much in my strength, and took an excess of exercise. I awoke between two and three in the morning, after getting sleep with great difficulty, and found my sensations, or spirits, as they are called, considerably in a flutter, and my pulse very quick. I rose, threw up the window, and walked in the stream of air; some time after which I again went to bed and slept, but had very strange dreams; in one of them I was riding a race-horse full speed over dangerous and steep places. This and other experiments seem to confirm the opinion of Dr. Parry, that there is an undue action of the arterial system. Sketched a short scene between Frank and Anne, and considered the arrangement of the second act of the opera.

"18th.—Corrected and transcribed the first scene, and wrote the duet Act ii. Met Brown at Norwich, and promised him a letter of recommendation to Hamburg. Parry, jun. at Debrett's, &c.

peror had issued a decree, by which persons having a bank of Vienna were required to advance thirty a loan, for which the whole, bearing at present four uld be advanced to five; but that persons refusing the of thirty per cent. should receive no interest for the ly in the bank. Went to Hampstead, rode about a ulf. Pinkerton pleasant in manner, and apparently not Professes to avoid metaphysical inquiry—his memory ntive of historical facts and biographical anecdotes.”

CHAP. VIII.

—Debrett read a philippic by Francis, from his parlia-ates, against Thurlow, delivered, I think, in 1784, on ill. It had greater strength, and a better style, than Francis capable of. Went, for the first time, to the xt door but one to Debrett's, and ate an ice. A no-oler, billiard-player, and thief, called the Diamond, and escapes, has been detected in stealing stockings; d will probably be transported for life. Should I d time, some of his pranks, as part of the history of ind, might be worth recording. Sastres, an Italian, y Boswell in his 'Life of Johnson,' was at the fruit-ed him if he knew Boswell. The name excited his he spoke of Boswell as a proud, pompous, and selfish who obtruded himself upon every one, and, by his xiety, lost what would otherwise have been willingly s an instance, Johnson did not once mention him in r their pretended intimate and sincere friendship; nself had that honour. This account did but con-ernal evidence of Boswell's own book. Notwith-nson's professions, which were but efforts to be kind nk it impossible he should either feel esteem or affec-a man. I drank one cup of strong tea, and another half is I attribute a second restless night; I went to sleep ty after twelve, awoke before three, as on the 17th, window, walked in the air, and went to bed. By an doze of a few minutes, but was soon perfectly awake, o the library, where I sat undressed, pointing and correcting the opera, till about five. I then went to bed, and slept till nine, but it was not sound and healthful sleep. Johnson complains, in one of his letters (vol. iii. of Boswell's 'Life,') of having had but one sound night's rest during twenty years. Johnson drank tea to excess. To some persons, I have no doubt, it is a wholesome beverage; to others, I suspect, it is highly pernicious.

"20th.—Called on Foulkes and Robinson; neither at home. Mr. Armstrong informs me that several persons have been afflicted, like myself, with hæmorrhage, told me that in Ruspini's cases of cures performed by his styptic, was one of a mathematical instrument-maker, of Dean Street, who really had, as Ruspini asserts, a hæmorrhage of the nose stopped by the styptic, but who died, ten days afterwards, in an apoplectic fit. We both conjectured such discharges of blood were frequently beneficial. Read the papers at Debrett's as usual; the same sanguinary measures and modes of revenge mutually practised in Ireland. Played chess and billiards with Geiseveiller; drank no tea, yet had another restless night, little better than the last.

"21st.—I daily, but slowly, proceed with my opera. Saw Banks of K. at Debrett's, and M. the ——'s, member in the last parliament, who very characteristically told me (somebody having sent him the translation of Schiller's 'Don Carlos') that he accepted every thing which was given him. I looked, and he endeavoured to correct himself, by adding, if it did not exceed the value of an octavo volume. A great gossip, with little understanding; and I am almost surprised that a look should excite in him a temporary feeling of his habitual selfishness. Played chess and billiards with Geiseveiller. The marker, a garrulous old Irishman, affirmed that Irish wafers were better than English: the reason he gave was, that after a letter was sealed, you might open it, with an Irish wafer, but not with an English. He pretended to talk philosophy; said there was but one colour, and that the way to prove it was to produce total darkness, and then a brown dog would be white. The sun, he said, regulated the tides, and it is the moon, and not the sun, that is the cause of light. His own absurd manner of explaining his blunders is highly ludicrous.

"22nd.—Wrote the chief part of Scene 7., Act ii. Called on Sir F. Bourgeois, to see a landscape he is painting. It is one of his best; the tone is admirable, the composition and execution spirited. After pointing out what I supposed to be its merits, I d, that the head of the cow in the foreground was, in my opinion, too large; the wide, open mouth of a dog barking was charged; his clouds, likewise, I said, were not sufficiently long, too much in mass, and not tinted as clouds on such a day are. We conversed of B., who had made a favourable report to him of the reception I gave him, and of my pictures.

On the subject of standing in the royal presence, Sir F. said Mr. Kemble seemed to doubt that this was so severely exact; for when he and Mrs. Siddons were commanded to read a poem to the Royal Family, and a splendid circle was assembled to them, the Lord Chamberlain came and informed them that they had permission to be seated. But this is a confirmation of tiquette, and the exception may be accounted for in a variety of ways. He that does not fear to be invidious may begin. Sir F. told me, that in the new edition of Pilkington's 'Dictionary of Letters,' there is a life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, which some attribute to Dr. Wolcott, others to Opie. Returned, read the Preface of Johnson.' Isaac Read there mentioned as a man superior to all others in his knowledge of English literature. I have heard Ritson say much the same; if so, it does not make him vain at all. His name, as a commentator on Shakspeare, is added to that of Johnson, Steevens, and Malone; yet I remember one day seeing him walk with seemingly great humility at the tail of the procession, they attentive to each other, or, perhaps, each to himself, Read wholly overlooked. Boswell likewise prates (for I think it very appropriate) of Dr. Towers, who, though a whig, is in his opinion one of good writers. Let the works of Towers testify. As a man when he is in a society where speeches are to be made, he is imprudent, verbose, and overflowing with a vapid kind of rage. He was the tail-piece and butt of the late Dr. Kippis, who, I called a man of moderate talents, is not injured.

3rd.—Read P——'s tragedy. Contains some poetry and passion; presents a picture of the manners of the distant age in which the scene is laid, superior to any thing I remember to have read, but is occasionally verbose. Has not enough of action and is deficient in plot. Is much better, however, than most things which pass current. Wrote the 'Mariners' Glee,' the short scene 8., song excepted. Nothing at Debreth's, except Irish affairs, and contradiction of the reports, which for many days have been floating, of the capture of Buonaparte.

&c. Ate little meat at dinner; took half a pint of milk and bread between six and seven o'clock, which served for tea and supper, and slept soundly. Mr. Birch came, and restored the chilled varnish of the pictures by damping, then gently rubbing them dry with a cloth, and afterward with flannel.

"24th. — Sketched Scene 9. of opera. Attended picture-sale in the Haymarket: W—— the auctioneer, late a bankrupt, paying eighteen-pence in the pound. The best pictures, all or most of them the property of W——, a picture-dealer, notorious for practising the worst tricks of that tricking trade. He bought his own pictures at high prices, the auctioneer running them up as if he had a room full of bidders, when he had not one; which artifice, I imagine, was for the purpose of asserting to his customers that each picture fetched such and such a sum, even at an auction. A man ought not to throw away his property, and a picture not fetching its worth may be honestly bought in; but I do not imagine there was a hope of selling good pictures at this season of the year. No news at Debrett's. Observed the same regimen at dinner and tea, with the same success.

"25th. — Went with Geiseveiller to see the picture of the Siege of Valenciennes, by Louthembourg. He went to the scene of action accompanied by Gilray, a Scotchman, famous among the lovers of caricature; a man of talents, however, and uncommonly apt at sketching a hasty likeness. One of the merits of the picture is the portraits it contains, English and Austrian. The Duke of York is the principal figure as the supposed conqueror; and the Austrian General, who actually directed the siege, is placed in a group, where, far from attracting attention, he is but just seen. The picture has great merit; the difference of costume, English and Austrian, Hulan, &c., is picturesque. The horse drawing a cart in the foreground, has that faulty, affected energy of the French school, which too often disgraces the works of Louthembourg. Another picture by the same artist, as a companion to this, is the Victory of Lord Howe on the 1st of June; both were painted at the expense of Mechel, printseller at Basle, and of V. and R. Green, purposely for prints to be engraved from them. For the pictures they paid 500*l.* each, besides the expenses of Gilray's journeys to Valenciennes, Portsmouth, &c. Saw Mr. E—— at Debrett's, who told me he had it from one of the treasury people, that the present King of Prussia, intending to celebrate his accession by a festival at Berlin, caused preparations to be

, and scaffolding to be raised, on which was a throne with an it of steps. This was noticed by the citizens, who gave the
; to understand the steps were too numerous, and the throne levated. They afterwards thought further of the matter, and unced their opinion that such a festival was unnecessary ; on h the hint was taken, the preparations were discontinued, and money set apart for that purpose was distributed among the

It was observed by —, the Quidnunc apothecary, that government of Spain exhibited tokens of dissolution, he reg to the loan and voluntary contributions at present pe-red for there. I remarked, if this argument were true, there but an ill augury for Austria, with its forced loan of the bank ienna. Lord Thanet came in, and was questioned concerning osecution which, it is said, government have instituted against and others, for an attempt to rescue O'Connor in the court at lstone. He answered he heard this prosecution was begun, had yet received no official notice of it. The coachman of ge Buller, he said, was knocked down in court, and ready to r he, the Earl, was the assailant, though he sat with the sel, and was never out of the eye of the judge. The company ned Buller's faculties are decayed (he has had a paralytic e). As a proof, he tells different stories at different times erning this riot. Another adduced by Thanet is, that, in ning up the evidence, instead of saying the second prisoner, hom he was referring, he repeatedly said the second witness, arrow at length got up in a pet, and called, 'You mean the id prisoner, my lord.' M—— and Lady W——, with her were at Debrett's, the only persons when I first went. She ng her usual masculine rhodomontade concerning Fullarton's e of the Queen, in his speech on the regency business, which — searched for in Debrett's 'Parliamentary Register,' but ould not point out the passage, or at least find the language h she had imputed to him. M——, anxious I should know as so familiar with a lady of rank, three times repeated her

I kept my eye on the paper I was reading. Was this e, or a proper treatment of petty vanity? His being once in ament gave him an introduction to various persons whose he affects to despise, but whose notice he most spaniel-like
s. A part of his gossip is, always carefully to tell what lord ned him of this, and what baronet or lady made such and such a remark. He appears to live with true Scotch economy except that he is a great feeder and drinker. He hunts for invitations to dinner. Drank tea with Geiseveiller, G——, F and Gessner; F—— a man of very confined intellect; but Bavarian, he is so prejudiced as to imagine Bavaria superior to other countries in or out of Germany. Three other persons, after tea, two of them English continental traders; the third a German from Frankfort, who has executed contracts for government, and is come to England to solicit payment, which, after three years petitioning and dunning, he is still unable to obtain. So G—— tells me, who has it, I suppose, from himself.

"26th. — Read Boswell. Worked at the opera. Bought a new coat at King's. Went to Debrett's. The news there, that Buonaparte and his whole fleet were taken: it was communicated by H—— to the horse volunteers that were reviewing in St. James's Park; they immediately gave three huzzas, and it ran from ear to ear through the crowd. It was false. Such a scene tragically ridiculous. An officer of note had arrived from St. Vincent; conjecture immediately knew his business: they were the first to believe what conjecture affirmed, and men shout and rejoiced at the imaginary destruction of their fellow-boss. Buonaparte has thus been captured at least a dozen times. On one of these occasions Lord L——, as I hear, communicated the news to one of the B——'s, began his letter with three hurrahs.

"27th. — Concluded corrections and additions to the score of the opera. Read the papers at Debrett's. The same sanguinary measures still pursued in Ireland. The prevailing party seem to contemplate the temporary success of Robespierre not his catastrophe. Bought more books at King's. Went to see Geiseveiller to see a pretended picture by Correggio, and another by Paul Potter. The latter, I believe, is a true picture; the figures and trees excellent; the composition detestable: a view of a public walk in Holland, with cows and strait-lined railing. St. James's Park before the alterations. Of Correggio having perhaps never seen a picture, I cannot pretend to judge; but his sketch, for it is no more, produces too feeble an effect to be likely to we may decide from internal evidence. The owner modestly valued it at nine hundred guineas for it, or ninety-five paid down, and the same sum annually for nine years on good security. The expectations that men form to themselves are pitifully ridicu-

"28th. — Reconsidered the two first acts of the opera before proceeding with the third. Nothing at Debrett's. Read the first act of '———' carefully, making pencil marks. Walked to Hampstead; dined with Pinkerton; and after some pleasant literary conversation relating to the Venerable Bede, &c., made my remarks to him on his tragedy. He received them with great candour, but was much more desirous that I should correct than that he should. Requested me to take the tragedy back, and go through the four succeeding acts with the same freedom of criticism used in the first. I have promised to perform the task within three weeks. My sleep remarkably sound after my exercise. P—— told me that when he was at Edinburgh during the American war, the governor of the castle received despatches. Lady ——, his friend, in the French sense of the word, was with him, and he was half drunk. Unfit for the task himself, he gave her the despatches to read. The lady has a warm imagination, and is delighted by a grand display: something that she read inflamed her fancy, and she exclaimed, 'Governor, here is great news; you must order the castle guns to be fired directly.' The governor took her word for it, and gave orders accordingly: but the great news, like the capture of Buonaparte in Hyde Park on Thursday, was wholly ideal. The guns were fired, the city was alarmed, crowds came running to know the reason, and the maudlin governor was disgraced and laughed at.

"29th. — Monsieur Julien, the assistant of Colnaghi, the print-seller, came with Geiseveiller to see my pictures. He formerly was an auctioneer in Paris, where he sold some famous collections. He praised quite enough; but the French and Italians think that is what politeness requires. Wrote additional verses to songs in the first act of the opera. Clementi and Geiseveiller to dinner. Conversed on health: I maintaining that exercise and moderate feeding were absolutely necessary for people of and after middle age.

"30th. — Third act still under consideration. Nothing at Debrett's, but the respite of Bond in Dublin. The papers state Farmer's library to have sold for ——, and his pictures for 500*l*. King, the auctioneer, informs me the first sum is accurate, but the pictures brought only 50*l*. I saw them. They were select rubbish: unauthenticated portraits by unknown painters. The sale of Farmer's library astonished every body. His rule was not to exceed three shillings for any book ; except once, when he paid three-and-sixpence for a pamphlet, which brought fifteen guineas in the sale. This anecdote I understood to be on the authority of Dr. Gosset, who is the most constant attendant at book sales of any man in England, booksellers not excepted. Farmer collected all old pamphlets and black letter books, whenever he could pick them up cheap, and these were resold at enormous prices, not for the value of the information they conveyed, but their scarcity. I viewed them as they lay in the auction-room, and books and pictures seemed to be the very refuse of the stalls.

“31st. — Finished Boswell’s ‘Life of Johnson :’ the author still continuing a pompous egotist, servile, selfish, and cunning ; as is evident from the documents and pictures he gives of himself ; and defending and condemning, not according to any principles which his own experience and observation had taught, but in conformity to those opinions, whatever they might be, right or wrong, which might most probably ingratiate him with the powerful. As a piece of biography, it is a vile performance ; but as a collection of materials, it is a mine. Called on B ——. The head of Kemble painted by him for Desenfans is a fine likeness, and a good picture. Saw a pair of his landscapes ; but indifferent performances. At one time he copied the old masters. One of these copies after Berghem but in the style of Wouvermans, is a good imitation, pencilled with great labour and exactness, but not with the freedom of an original. The subject, a man on a white galloway, bird-catching ; but the copy was not finished, nor the nets inserted. Wilson, he says, was indolent, and, in his latter time, used to make several attempts at each touch, before his hand reached the precise place. In this manner a picture would remain several days on the easel with but little apparent progress. If B —— be accurate, the colours on Wilson’s palette did not exceed four, and his common menstruum was linseed oil, instead of other oils eight or ten times as dear. He had much comic humour, would turn from his easel to the window, make whimsical remarks on the passengers, pause to recollect himself, and begin painting again. He was addicted to liquor, by which his nose became enlarged, and so irritable, that the handkerchief was frequently applied to it, and kept in his bosom for that purpose. Glad of every opportunity to escape from labour to his favourite indulgence, he would say to any acquaintance who happened to call, ‘Come, let us go and take a drop of something. I have painted enough for one day.' Farrington and Hodges were his pupils; and many of the pictures that pass for Wilson's were painted by them, but retouched by himself. Thus the same picture became multiplied. He would even buy copies made from his pictures, work upon them, and sell them as his own. To a certain degree they were such, but the practice was dishonest; for an unskilful eye could not detect the inferior parts. Arts like these are the ruin of honest and well-earned fame. Wilson, however, was a man of uncommon genius, of which he has left sufficient and undoubted proofs. He and Sir Joshua had conceived some ill-founded prejudices against each other. Under their influence, Sir Joshua once said, at the Academy, Gainsborough was the best English landscape-painter. Wilson, happening to be unperceived at his elbow, replied, 'You mean the best English portrait-painter.' If it was not Opie, I forget who gave me this anecdote.

"August 1st. — Proceed with Middleton's 'Life of Cicero.' It is full of information. Wrote a song to-day, 'Dan Cupid,' &c.; and a glee yesterday, of 'Bitter pangs,' &c. for the opera. At De-brett's, Mr. Bouverie showed me the Cambridge paper. Flower, the editor, is a zealot of a bold but honest character. By his paper, he must necessarily have made himself extremely obnoxious to persons in power. He unsparingly assails all whose creed or moral conduct he thinks reproachable. Godwin has been several times attacked in his paper, and probably myself. A letter, written from Ireland by a colonel in the guards, asserts that the two O'Connors, Bond, and another whose name I have forgotten, have consented to inform against the insurgents, and transport themselves from Ireland, on condition that the life of Bond be spared. Lord Thanet said, he had betted fifty guineas to half-a-crown that this was a false assertion. I think myself certain he will win. A. O'Connor is a noble-minded man, or I am wretchedly mistaken; and it is said his brother Roger is even his superior. Met Mr. G——, whom I informed that the comedy of 'He's much to Blame' was written by me. He testified great satisfaction at the shame its success brought on my persecutors, and that the king, not knowing the author, had commanded it twice. Mentioned his great popularity among the country theatres; invited me to Turnham Green, and I promised to dine there next Sunday se'nnight.

"2nd.—Read Middleton. Wrote a song, 'The Fiat of Fate' Act iii. Went to Debrett's; read a high-flown, complimentary letter, from some city volunteers, to Colonel —, a bankrupt persuading him to continue in their command, and describing him as an unfortunate man, but of exemplary worth. A—— remarked that the aristocrats of the corps had thus stirred in his behaviour because he had gone through thick and thin to serve persons of power. Walked down Constitution Hill, and wrote Clara's two songs, of the third act, in the park. Just as I finished, with my pencil in my hand, I saw I was observed by General F——. We know each other personally, but are not acquainted. Acquaintance, indeed, among persons of rank, I have very few. My feelings will not suffer me to be forward; and such persons are known only to the obtruding, or those who minister to their immediate pleasures and vices. Men of literature lay claim to honours to which men of rank have but seldom any good pretensions, and both seem jealous of their individual prerogatives.

"3rd.—Wrote duet, Act iii. Worked at the opera. Asked Weld, at Debrett's, if he knew Boswell. He had met him at coffee-houses, &c., where B. used to drink hard and sit late. It was his custom, during the sessions, to dine daily with the judge, invited or not; he obtruded himself every where. Lowe (mentioned by him in his 'Life of Johnson') once gave me a humorous picture of him. Lowe had requested Johnson to write him a letter, which Johnson did, and Boswell came in while it was writing. His attention was immediately fixed; Lowe to the letter, retired, and was followed by Boswell. 'Nothing,' said Lowe, 'could surprise me more. Till that moment he had entirely overlooked me, that I did not imagine he knew there was such a creature in existence; and he now accosted me with the most overstrained and insinuating compliments possible.' 'How do you do, Mr. Lowe? I hope you are very well, Mr. Lowe. Pardon my freedom, Mr. Lowe, but I think I saw my dear friend Dr. Johnson, writing a letter for you.' 'Yes, sir.' 'I hope you will not think me rude; but if it would not be too great a favour you would infinitely oblige me if you would just let me have sight of it. Every thing from that hand, you know, is so invaluable.' 'Sir, it is on my own private affairs, but'—— 'I would not pry into a person's affairs, my dear Mr. Lowe, by any means. I am sure you would not accuse me of such a thing; only, if it were no particular secret'—— 'Sir, you are welcome to read the letter.' 'I thank you, my dear Mr. Lowe; you are very obliging; I take it exceedingly kind. (Having read.) It is nothing, I believe, Mr. Lowe, that you would be ashamed of'—— 'Certainly not.' 'Why, then, my dear sir, if you would do me another favour, you would make the obligation eternal: if you would but step to Peele's Coffee House with me, and just suffer me to take a copy of it, I would do any thing in my power to oblige you.' 'I was overcome,' said Lowe, 'by this sudden familiarity and condescension, accompanied with bows and grimaces. I had no power to refuse; we went to the coffee-house, my letter was presently transcribed, and, as soon as he had put his document into his pocket, Mr. Boswell walked away as erect and as proud as he was half an hour before, and I ever afterward was unnoticed. Nay, I am not certain,' added he, sarcastically, 'whether the Scotchman did not leave me, poor as he knew I was, to pay for my own dish of coffee.'

"4th.—Continued the opera through Scene 9., Act iii. Colonel Barry at Debrett's, returned from Ireland: rejoiced to see each other. Spoke of Ireland as subdued by the divisions which government had found the means to create, and chiefly by the aid of the native yeomanry. Read reviews and magazines.

"5th.—Corrected Scene 10. Wrote song for Florid. Called on N——, who had been sent for by the Duchess of D——; she broke her appointment, made another, and broke that, with a note apologising, and desiring he would come again, and bring a copy of his very excellent journal. This a good deal resembles scenes I had with her in 1783, except that I made application to her (for commendatory letters to our ambassador at Paris), which Mr. N—— did not. Pinkerton, Godwin, Stoddart, and J. Parry, to dinner. Stoddart, as usual, acute, but pertinacious and verbose; Godwin clear and concise.

"6th.—Proceeded with the opera. Walked an hour. Returned, and finished it. Nothing at Debrett's. Have read 'Monthly Magazine' and 'Review' for some days. Individually, the numbers of such works appear dull; collectively, they afterwards become highly amusing.

"7th.—Read and sent the opera to Mr. Harris, with a letter. Walked to Godwin. He proceeds with his novel. Gave a favourable account of Fenwick's pamphlet on Coigley.

"8th.—Began to consider my new comedy, which I am very desirous of enriching with numerous incidents.

"9th.—Debrett blames Robinson for publishing another translation of the 'Voyage of Perouse;' that already published by Johnson being complete, the size octavo. R.'s edition is to be quarto, the plates in a grander style. Debrett's phrase was, he would burn his fingers. Meditated on the comedy. Conceived two incidents arising from the poverty of my characters, of a pawnbroker's shop, and an antique ring. Dined with Geiseveiller, and G—— His German friends came after dinner. F—— displayed some knowledge in grammar; but was laughed at by me and G—— for being a disciple of Kant.

"10th.—Rose at seven, in good spirits, and apparently excellent health; persuaded, as I had been for some time, that my disease was gone, and my constitution improved. While eating my breakfast, soon after eight, was seized with a fifth fit of hemorrhoidal colic. The pain, as on former occasions, excruciating, yet resisted with so much determination by me, that I am persuaded its violence was considerably abated. I continued very ill through the day. In the night my dreams were extremely vivid, often disagreeable, but not always. I read and composed poetry that never had any other existence; engaged in metaphysical disputes; and busied myself with the plot of a comic opera. I conceived a nobleman and his servant, Spaniards, to have arrived at a castle with immense walls and turrets; and that the first thing the nobleman said, must be to tell his servant that they were now come to the place of action and must make their way into that castle. The various obstacles and incidents which this would afford, delighted me, while dreaming. A few years ago, having a slight fever, and lying awake in the night, I found I could speak extempore verses on any given subject (for I proposed two or three to myself), many of them approaching excellence, and the others full of high-sounding words, and such as would be thought excellent by some. Fear of increasing the fever made me rather endeavour to calm and appease my mind, than either to proceed or try to remember those I had made, which might amount to above thirty lines in number, as I believe. Have found nearly the same facility occasionally, when actually writing poetry, after having considered my subject a certain time, and made a certain number of verses, or rather, after rousing the faculties. In my sleep I have read marge of poetry that never was written. Others have told me have done the same. Mr. N—— says he has several times to bed with his mind wearied by considering a question of ce which he could not resolve, has slept or dozed, and the ation has intruded so forcibly upon his thoughts, that it has ed him.

1th.—Sent for Dr. Pitcairne. After he was gone, the pain r increased till I rose, half an hour after, when I experienced relief. Was induced to examine the nature of pain, and l that it is not, and from the nature of the human frame ot be, incessant. Could it be so, it must soon destroy the nt. Sensations are impelled upon us. Trifles, the tickling of ir, the trains of ideas which pain itself begets, divert the tion. These intervals appear to be short in proportion to the sity of the pain. Played a game at chess with Geiseveiller : e beginning with great brilliancy; at the end, with great dity. Received a well written letter from Mrs. B——, and pera from Harris.

2th.—Harris firmly of opinion the opera will be a good after-, but a dangerous first-piece; I obliged to yield, the slave of ircumstances. He agreed to give me two hundred and fifty ls for the piece and the copyright; and, should it run twenty s, to make the sum three hundred. Urged me to proceed with omedy, which I promised, if possible, to send at the close of mber. Underwood, a young artist, called to see my pictures. as full of admiration, but he is a youth. Godwin called to re after my health, and Mrs. Foulkes.

3th.—Pitcairne called, behaved very kindly, and refused his ould not visit Mr. G——, who had invited me. The Parrys, el B——, Mrs. F——, and Geiseveiller called. Yesterday o-day, amidst the pain, I reduced the opera, but not com-ly.

4th.—Mrs. F—— called: and Geiseveiller before and after g 'The Road to Ruin' for the first time at the Haymarket. perhaps is the only theatre in the three kingdoms, Drury- and the Opera House excepted, at which it has not been more probably fifty times than once. The custom of the res prevents its being performed in London, except at Covent en, where it first appeared.

5th.—Wrote to Harris and Robinson. Went to Mrs. B——.

who requested my advice and aid concerning a novel. A lively woman, upwards of sixty; widow of Dr. B. From a printer's mark in the margin, there is reason to suspect her novel has been clandestinely printed. If not, it certainly was in preparation for the press. Completed the reduction of the opera; and proceeded, as the day before, with reading Middleton's 'Cicero,' and correcting Pinkerton's tragedy.

"16th. — Visited by Dr. Pitcairne, to whom I had sent. Received his fee; is to call on Saturday. Smith the surgeon, Mrs. F., Samuel S., visitors. Read 'Wild Oats' (having this day received O'Keefe's works), a farce, but one in which much invention and feeling are displayed. Wrote an air to 'Dan Cupid,' in 'Old Clothesman.'

"17th. — Went to Debrett's, after taking the warm sea-bath. Col. B. and others praised the Cheltenham waters, as excellent for bilious affections. Walked home, not in the least fatigued.

"18th. — Visited by Dr. Pitcairne. Corrected tragedy.

"19th. — Walked into the park; but, overpowered with fatigue and heat, took rest in Whitehall chapel; was too giddy to pay much attention to the paintings of Rubens.

"20th. — Pitcairne called; thinks I ought to eat meat: refused his fee. 'Hugh Trevor' and 'Road to Ruin' sent to Geiseviller.

"21st. — Mr. Ramsey, who had acted as a clergyman and physician in the West Indies, returning, was one of the first promoters, by various pamphlets, of the inquiry into the slave-trade. An agent of the planters wrote against him, accusing him of want of humanity in his treatment of the sick slaves. He was advanced in years, and much agitated; the weather was hot, he made a journey, and wrote to contradict the calumny. This brought on an inward hemorrhage, of which he died. Mr. Armstrong gave me the above account; adding that there scarcely could be a more humane man than Mr. Ramsey. In the present state of my disorder, I am equally afraid of eating and fasting. Debility threatens me on one hand with the loss of power to repel the disease: and not improbably another fit, every mouthful I swallow. Patience and cheerfulness, experience tells me, are my best aids. I am patient, but cannot sufficiently recollect myself, so as to assume that constant cheerfulness which pain so frequently disturbs. This should be a temper of mind inculcated from infancy.

"22nd. — The perseverance with which I endeavour to notice

remember my own sensations, has occasioned Mr. Armstrong cuse me of being subject to violent and false alarms. He is keen. The consciousness I have of serenity is too firm and anent to be a deception; but I am persuaded my cure must nd on a still stricter attention to facts. Dr. Pitcairne came, ribed, and again refused his fee. Mr. Godwin called, and ain Johnson, an intelligent Scotch seaman, trading to Bremen Hamburg; says the Dutch are nearly as good sailors as the ish: as a proof, they, like the English, will navigate a small r with six hands, for which the French would require twelve, he Spaniards twenty; yet the navigation and work are best on board the English and Dutch. Geiseveiller, Mrs. Shield, F. and B. Mercier called.

October 3rd. — I now mean to recommence my diary, which een interrupted by the disease so often before mentioned, on ming to a crisis, which was all but mortal.

Went to Debrett's. Met B. and Parry. Saw Emery and Mills in second and third acts of 'The Road to Ruin.' Both merit. Emery the most. Second illumination night for Nelson's victory. Passed through the mean streets leading to the n Dials. The poor did not illuminate. I was in a coach, 3 too weak to walk.

4th. — Called on Carlisle. Visited P—— and bride; a woman easing manners and intelligent countenance. On return met mnister and Wathen. Dined at Kensington Gore with Mr. Mrs. B. and J. Parry.

5th. — Mr. Attwood came by appointment, and received from he score of 'When sharp is the frost,' &c. composed by me, corrected by Mr. Shield, for the opera of 'The Old Clothes.' Sent back the manuscript by him to the theatre. Called y J. Bannister.

6th. — Six pints of sweet wine given me by J. Bannister.

7th. — Music. Haydn. Fanny accompanied by Messrs. Watts Mackenzie. Mr. Henry present. Dined at Turnham Green vitation. Complaint of the G. family of the want of rational ty. The villas of the place having become the country houses ealthy but ignorant town tradesmen. Butchers, tailors, tallow- dlers, &c. who make these their holiday and Sunday seats. age to N. from G., inviting communication, as well as to and further intercourse. Whimsical disputes of half-drunken passengers in the coach, on my return, concerning and descriptive of Nelson's victory. Each man, according to his own account, minutely acquainted with all the occurrences.

"8th.—Called on N., to deliver the message from G. Apothecary at Debrett's affirms there are letters in town of Buonaparte, taken with his despatches; particularly one to his wife, accusing the Directory of having purposely betrayed him into an irretrievable situation of danger. I learnt from Mr. N.'s commonplace book that it was on the 11th of March, 1796, that he, Arthur O'Connor, Dr. Parr (Bellendenus), Godwin, Mackintosh, Opie, Powel (a young Oxonian brought by Parr), and Col. Barry, dined with me. I consider the meeting of so many celebrated as well as extraordinary men, as an occurrence worthy of being remembered.

"9th.—Met Weld at Debrett's, who congratulated me on my recovery in a very friendly manner. Drank tea and sat part of the evening with Mr. and Mrs. Kemble (the father and mother of Mrs. Siddons). She, except her usual complaints of rheumatism, cheerful and conversable. We talked of Hereford, Ludlow, Worcester races, Leominster, Bewdley, Bromsgrove, Droitwich, and Worcester again, as places I had played in while in the Kemble company.

"10th.—Read the papers at Debrett's. Weld asked Parson — where Buonaparte is at present? 'In India, past all doubt,' was his answer. I remarked that the parson had always been a fast, but fanciful traveller.

"11th.—The day rainy; played five games at billiards before dinner. Went in the evening to see 'Lovers' Vows' played for the first time at Covent Garden. Translated from the German by some retainer at court, as Mrs. Inchbald told Mr. Robinson, but corrected and altered by her. My legs so swelled that I could only stay the first four acts; which at times made me laugh and cry heartily. Saw the Parrys at the theatre. James, as usual, fastidious and dissatisfied.

"12th.—John Parry at Debrett's, praised the whole play, including the fifth act, of last night. B., the miniature painter, with Bannister, called: B. saw my pictures, which he praised very much. Sold Bannister the copy of Wilson for five guineas. Finished translating the first act of Kotzebue's 'Indian in England,' which has employed me five or six days; and as I intended essentially to alter the character of Samuel or Balaam, more time employed in the revisal. This character has keeping in the out not enough of the vis comica.

—Walked to Brompton to return Mr. S.'s call. Not at ack on foot to Debrett's : obliged to rest several times.

—Gave young Watts the letters of recommendation for band, to P. and Salomon. Picture-dealer's son, near Place, brought a little oval Wilson, bought of him by , to show me. The water enchantingly transparent, the ly less excellent, the composition in itself trifling, but ily contrived to produce contrast. Bannister came soon another Wilson, which I think doubtful, yet a charming a copy:—I mean as far as respects the right hand part, and the distances. The figure seated is an admirable und no less admirably managed. The massy dark wood e Hornsey Wood) appeared too lifeless for Wilson ; and who called afterwards with Mr. Heath (I believe Cord he knew the original, of which this was a copy. The he two, the picture-dealer told me, was fifteen pounds. th Bannister on Wathen, and afterwards on J. Aickin, etermined to resign. Forebodings of bankruptcy ; such wood and canvass not to be had ; yet three thousand tely given for an estate. Cumberland sent his 'Tiberius,' l been repeatedly refused, as a new play, to the theatre. eerfully received till the title was read, and then im- returned. A letter from C. to Aickin, stated that it stake to suppose it the same 'Tiberius ;' it was no long- edy ; and if magic, music, scenery, and dialogue could n audience, he had greater expectations from this than piece he had ever produced. It was the most laboured, st revised, and the best written of all his works. The luded with an appeal to posterity. B. and K. were in- pend a week at the country house of C. B. acknow- was partial to a good supper, and K. the same. Of e C. was sparing. 'I suppose, gentlemen,' said he, no supper eaters ; a little bread and cheese and small l you take.' Their false modesty and contrary wishes 1 feel awkward and look silly, but they confirmed him in ition. When supper time came, the bread and cheese beer appeared. They flattered themselves, however, le of wine would be the successor. They were deceived.

not a drop of wine was brought. Two or three nights made them weary of this ; and, on one day, they announced their intention of departing the next. 'If so, gentlemen,' said the host, 'I mean to give you a treat this evening, before you leave me ; and such a treat ! But I do not wish to anticipate.' This put them in high spirits ; they imagined a couple of fowls, with good old port or madeira, would be served up ; and they had highly whetted their fancies with this supposition. The evening came, and with it the treat. C. approached, with a 'Now, gentlemen, you shall have it ; you will find whether I keep my word. Here it is. I suppose you have heard of it ? Tiberius — I can assure you, the best of all my works.' So saying he spread his manuscript, and began to read. K., without ceremony, fell asleep in the first act. B. with great difficulty listened through the second, when the author luckily became tired of his task, either from the labour of reading, or the drowsiness of his auditors.

"15th. — Walked out before noon, intending to proceed half way to Hammersmith, and then take coach ; but finding I had not motive enough to overcome my weakness, turned back and went to the billiard table, where I played an hour and a half. Such is the efficacy of having a motive.

"16th. — Nobody at Debrett's. Finished translating the second act of the 'Indians.' Mr. Carlisle called. I not at home.

"17th. — Called on Carlisle. Saw a picture of fish, well painted, but praised by him extravagantly.

"18th. — Walked to Debrett's, and King's auction room. Saw Sturt, M.P. and Parry, jun. Mr. P. called in the forenoon. Praised the passion and power of language with which my tragedy, he says, is written.

"19th. — Finished translating the 'Indians.' Called on Opie ; saw his view of St. Michael's Mount, a moonlight, the manner hard, but the scenery and effects grand, and the composition good. A well painted portrait, likewise, of Dr. A. Went to Birch ; saw a Berghem, as he said, but which I doubt ; a good picture. Walked from thence, with Bannister, to Simpson's, (picture cleaner). Saw the famous Niobe landscape by Wilson ; and another by him, lately bought of Sir William Beechey, which Sir William told me was, according to Farrington's account, partly the work of Wilson, and partly of Farrington. Simpson angrily asserts Farrington never touched the picture, and asks fifty guineas for it.

10th.—Called on Sir Francis Bourgeois; saw the additional picture of Desenfans. He, as usual, spoke highly in praise of Kemble. Very civil at Debrett's. Billiards in the evening. Compton, engineer, Moore, the attorney, another person, and Palmer, jun., or of the epilogue to 'Lovers' Vows' came in. All extremely to me. When I returned home, found Salomon, who accompanied Fanny with his usual feeling and enthusiasm. Spoke in presence of Haydn, which well accorded with my own sentiments. Went till one o'clock, and occasioned me to eat too much supper. Advised to favour Watts, if in his power. Is desirous of setting English opera.

11th.—Called on young Watts concerning the opera engagement. Da Vinci's Battle of the Standard, by Edelinck, a proof, at Bond's, upholsterer; cost him two guineas; cheap, I believe, at

Saw Mrs. Shield. After dinner, was above an hour walking Fanny to the top of Oxford Street and back.

12th.—Wrote to Shield. Read the papers. Letter from Dr. Gey, advising me against the Bath waters. Dined with Robinson. Yesterday, Robinson and myself are to exchange acquittances.

13th.—Called on Aickin. Debts accumulating, business neglected, promises never kept. Hammersley's receiving clerk in the hurry, the whole in a state of disorder, yet the houses great. Walkers, of Manchester, ruined by the war and ministerial excutions. Francis and T. at Debrett's. The latter, as usual fine in describing the progress of Buonaparte, whom he conducted to India with great facility, asserting, Egypt and the revolutionizing of crocodiles were not the objects of Buonaparte.

14th.—Returned Mr. Boaden's call, and there saw a female portrait said to be by Leonardo da Vinci; but I think not, though an excellent old picture. Met Banks, Weld, and Bosville at Debrett's.

15th.—Called on Mr. Compton, who advises no sale of effects this spring. Proceed daily, but slowly, in correcting 'The Inquiry' Papers at Debrett's. Robinson did not keep his appointment.

16th.—Compton, auctioneer, called and looked at books and residues. Debrett's. Wrote to Mr. P. His wife ill.

17th.—Clementi called, but Fanny was out. Mr. M. called. Attends the Old Bailey bar, from a desire to save the lives of felons. Talked a little metaphysics. I read Pope's characteristic to him.

18th.—Called on —, and conversed with Mr. Buller on occult and final causes. Saw Tobin's brother. Two girls of the town, walking in Newman Street, praised the goodness of God and, as the weather had been very rainy for some days, they hoped His goodness would extend itself to render it fair all the next week that they might walk the streets in comfort. A man being tried for a capital offence at the Old Bailey, the jury retired to consider of their verdict. The three principal witnesses had been ordered out of court, after having given their testimony, but stood in the passage at the door. The reward for convicting the man, as usual, was forty pounds. The jury returned, and pronounced the fatal sentence, Guilty. As soon as the sound reached these witnesses, they jumped up, clapped their hands, and exclaimed to each other, Guilty! Guilty! M. was in court, and witnessed the transaction.

"29th.—F., jun. came to ask me to petition the proprietors of Drury Lane theatre for a dresser's place, for the wife of a door-keeper, who had died suddenly in the exercise of his office. I could not comply, because of the very improper conduct of these proprietors in refusing to notice the letters I wrote to them, when they ceased, without any apparent cause, to play 'Knave or Not.' But I agreed to write a letter for the woman to copy in her own name.

"30th.—Wrote the letter; F. having appointed to come for that purpose at nine, was with me at ten. Young S., and B.'s nephew, came in their fathers' name to ask for orders. Both families are rich, but I complied, and procured them. B. and N., M.P. being at Brighton, where Major R. was, N. praised the Major as a man of great information, his friend, and one with whom B. ought to be intimate. B. said, they had met and spoken, and as there could be no great harm, he would accompany N. to visit R. They happened to meet him, and R. presently took occasion to tell N., that, from the principles he professed, and the speeches he had made in parliament, he could not but consider him as an enemy to his king and country; he therefore desired they might have no more intercourse. B. laughed at N. and his friend, but remarked the Major was an honest man, for most people would have said as much when he was absent, without the courage to declare such sentiments to his face. Hare, St. John, and others at Debrett's.

"31st.—P. and I had a dispute concerning Shakspeare. He asserted, quoting Gray and Warton as his supporters, that the thing in which Shakspeare excels all other writers, and in that only, is sudden bursts of passion. I allowed he did excel other iters in this, as in almost every other part of composition, but at he excelled them most in the full flow of passion. I doubt I s abrupt and dogmatical, for he appears to be a good-natured m ; yet I could see he went away displeased.

“ November 1st.—Met Weld and H. at Debrett’s. Pitt met H.

horseback, the day on which it was determined to strike Fox’s me out of the list of privy-councillors, and made such strange ces at him, that H. went to Brookes’s and reported him mad ; n which a person present said, ‘That accounts for a strange peech, as I thought, of Grenville, who affirmed, that while Pitt was in his present temper, he would not see him, but in the pre- sence of a third person.’ The — said to be of the Orange party, and inimical to Cornwallis. Weld affirms, that since London was a city, it never had such immense exports as at this moment.

“ 2nd.—Wrote yesterday an apology to P. for my warmth in dispute ; and received a very friendly and proper answer to-day.

“ 4th. — Music at Mr. Mackenzie’s. Haydn’s symphony quintetto and Mozart : both men of uncommon genius ; but the latter, impatient after novelty and superior excellence, often forgets the flow of passion in laboriously hunting after new thoughts which, when thus introduced, have the same effect in music, as the con-cetti of the Italians have in poetry ; and for these Mozart is frequently extolled as superior to Haydn.

“ 6th. — Went and settled with Mr. Robinson ; that is, I made over to him the copies and copyright of ‘School for Arrogance,’ ‘Deserted Daughter,’ ‘Man of Ten Thousand,’ ‘Knave or Not,’ ‘Hugh Trevor,’ and ‘Anna St. Ives,’ in consideration of an acquittal of sums due to him, to the amount of 340*l.*, and a conditional promissory note on his part to pay me 150*l.* more, when the copies and copyright shall have realised to him the sum of 504*l.* Procured a copy of the ‘School for Ingratitude,’ advertised by Bell gratis, that is, at the author’s expense ; he being angry, or rather enraged, at the plagiarism which he (falsely and ridiculously) accuses Messrs. Sheridan and Richardson of committing, by communicating his manuscript to Mr. Reynolds to aid him in writing the comedy of ‘Cheap Living.’

“ 7th. — Called on Carlisle. Conversd on the necessity of cultivating youthful sports and habits in mature and advanced age. Bought books at King’s. Met Harris the manager, and soon after Tierney, M.P. ; both congratulated me on my recovery.

"8th. — Read 'Walpole's Painters.' Looked over and considered the scenes of my new comedy, of which I have sketched about six. Papers at Debrett's; picture sale in Cloak Lane. A walk, altogether, of about seven miles. Copies and rubbish at the sale. Sent Robinson an advertisement of my works, with an order to Symonds to deliver the 'Narrative,' and 'Windham's Letter.'

"11th. — Called on, and conversed with, Geiseveiller, concerning his new enterprise. Saw a proof of Duncan's Victory, by Fittler, which I think but indifferent. Went to, and conversed with, Aickin on the subject of 'The Exiles.' Kelly very desirous of having something of mine to set. Aickin informed me, that Tobin has written two dramatic pieces.

"14th. — Wrote two songs for 'The Exiles,' the second of Balaam, and the first of Harry. Dined on Monday with P.; Platonist Taylor and D. present. Taylor intolerant and abusive to all who do not pretend to understand, and put faith in, his Platonic jargon. Had he the power, according to P., he would bring every man of us to the stake. From my own experience, P.'s description is scarcely exaggerated; but though a bigot, Taylor is an honest one. D., on the contrary, asked P. whether he had any principles? and when P. expressed his surprise at such a question, D. declared he had none. Saw Dr. Towers at Debrett's; his democracy still maintains its violence; I should scarcely exceed if I said its virulence. He asked me if the universal defection had not made me turn aristocrat. I answered, that I supposed my principles to be founded in truth, that is, in experience and fact: that I continued to believe in the perfectibility of man, which the blunders and passions of ignorance might apparently delay, but could not prevent; and that the only change of opinion I had undergone was, that political revolutions are not so well calculated to better man's condition as during a certain period I, with almost all the thinking men in Europe, had been led to suppose. The Doctor doubted man's perfectibility; was more inclined to think him a radical sinner; and said, as I held such opinions, I was, no doubt, a Necessarian; to which I readily assented. I do not know what connection the Doctor found between perfectibility and necessity; though such connection does certainly exist. Among other things I said, the best of us, at present, understood morality very imperfectly: his sanctity took offence at the assertion, and he replied, that some of us (meaning, no doubt, himself, and, perhaps, others who hold his tenets) understood it in full perfection; at which I could only smile and dissent.

"15th. — Saw pictures on show at Christie's, a wretched collection. Met H. in the room to-day, and M. yesterday; though both excel as engravers, their remarks showed they had but little judgment of pictures; a circumstance I have had frequent occasion to observe in engravers, and indeed in painters, though not perhaps so generally. 'Tis seldom that a tolerable painter is not a good judge of the mechanical defects or excellences of a picture. Read at Debrett's, in the papers, the manly behaviour of Tone, tried at Dublin, and cast for high-treason. Johnson the bookseller sent to the King's Bench Prison for selling Wakefield's pamphlet.

"16th. — Read the first act and part of the second of 'The Indian Exiles' to Bannister; and am convinced, by the effect it produced upon him, that it is much too dull for representation. I doubt how far it is worth the trouble of alteration. Met Sir F. B., lately come to town, at Debrett's. He was very kind. Went to the picture sale at Christie's. The stable-yards, asses, and pigs of Morland, as usual, fetched a good price.

"17th. — M. called, and, speaking on that subject, expressed his sorrow and surprise that W. should be acquainted with M., whom M., like most other people, considers as a very odd character. I mentioned what I conceived to be artifice in the conduct of W. as a public preacher. M. defended him against the charge, and gave me the following information. The famous Dr. Franklin, the present Sir J. B., Dr. Solander, Bentley, the partner of Wedgewood, and perhaps some few others, were desirous of putting a plan, conceived by Franklin, into practice; which was, to have a kind of chapel, or meeting-house, where all matters of faith should be omitted, and pure morality taught. W., at that time a dissenting teacher from Wales, was fixed on as the preacher at this new chapel; but at this period Franklin was obliged to conceal himself from Government, on American affairs, and remained some days shut up in the house of W., who, at that time, was a teacher of youth. The scheme, however, did not drop. A small chapel in Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, was hired to these moralists at one part of the Sunday, and to Methodists on the other. B. and Solander acted with great shyness, if not hypocrisy; and instead of countenancing W., and promoting the plan, they now and then peeped into the chapel, and got away as fast as they decently could. Bentley and M., the member for T., were more open in their conduct; but Bentley and W. disagreed, because Bentley urged him to insist on the immortality of the soul, and W. replied he could and would teach no other doctrines than such as agreed with the original plan. M. attributed the failure of the plan to this defection of B., Solander, and Bentley, but here I think he is mistaken. I attended this chapel myself, and became acquainted with W., whose manner was much too dry and cold, and his reasoning too confused, either to warm the passions or sufficiently interest the understanding. He afterwards saw me at the Sunday evening society, where discussion and the reading of philosophical papers were the business of the meetings: at these I read some papers; and my manner was so far animated, as to induce W. to propose to me that he and I should resume the plan of the chapel, and be joint preachers, which I positively declined. Since this time, we have met and spoken in the streets, but nothing more.

“18th.—Walked to Hampstead and dined with Pinkerton. He asked explanations of various of the corrections I advised and had made with pencil-marks in his tragedy. I had only gone through the four first acts, and he requested I would revise the fifth. Speaking of Dr. G., he said, that in 1792 it was his custom to declaim vehemently at the Stratford coffee-house, in favour of republicanism; and finding the alarm that was raised, and the tide turning, he soon after wrote in praise of the King, of mixed monarchy, and of the peculiar happiness derived from it by the English. The Doctor had been tutor to Lord H., for which an annuity was settled on him of a hundred a year. About the time of his turning royalist, Dr. — died; and, the place of — becoming vacant, G. went to Lord H., who was intimate with Dundas, and proposed, if his lordship would procure him this place, he would resign the annuity. The proposal was accepted, the place procured, and the Doctor's loyalty and royalty confirmed. Speaking of his literary talents, P. joined with me in thinking them rather below than above mediocrity. We differed in opinion concerning the perfectibility of man, against which he quoted the traditional and written authority of five thousand years, treating the supposition with great contempt, and some degree of humorous ridicule. According to him, men grow more corrupt so rapidly, that in his youthful dealings with book-sellers, &c., he met with nothing but open fairness, and at present he is obliged to be continually on his guard against cheating and chicanery. I could only answer, that, for my own part, I found no such general depravity to combat; and that, granting it were so, this was a narrow ground, belonging to temporary and local incident, by which the great question could not be decided.

" 20th. — Called on Sir Francis Burdett, who had just been reading in the newspaper the King's intended speech to-day (which for some sessions past has been published the morning before it is spoken), and eagerly asked my opinion what he, as an honest member of Parliament, ought to say, thinking it highly objectionable. I read it over, and pointed out parts which I consider, some as vicious in principle, others false in fact. He repeated the summary or skeleton of what he intended to say, part of which was sound sense, and part a repetition of questions a thousand times ineffectually asked. During the day, sketched the beginning scene of 'Hobson and Dobson.'

" 21st. — Worked at my comedy. Fairfax and Curtail, Headlong and the tradesmen, &c. Several politicians at Debrett's canvassing the King's speech, &c.

" 22nd. — Met a political parson at Debrett's whose first recollection was where he was to dine. Said that Brown, the Egyptian traveller, affirmed Buonaparte is safe in Egypt, and that Egypt was alone the grand object of the expedition. Received a friendly letter from Dr. Parry.

" 23rd. — Sketched in part the scenes of Melford and Caroline, Caroline and Fairfax, and Caroline and the wife of Norman. Think of rejecting the idea of twin-sisters. A wicked recruiting hand-bill of Ireland, published in to-day's 'Chronicle.' Spoke of it to General Hastings and others. It excited universal abhorrence.

" 24th. — Walked to S.'s, Paternoster Row, for the account between us, which he sent in the evening, wishing me to deduct seventy-six of the 'Narrative,' and twelve of the 'Letter to Windham,' which he pretends to have been lost by the binder, and this since the last settling, during which period the account states only three sold. Saw two or three good pictures at Nodin's, Leadenhall Street. Met Osmond, whom I had not seen for some years. He remarked, I was much altered and broken. He was the same to me. Time effects these changes, especially, as in my case, with the addition of illness, in despite of the little wisdom we at present possess. Conversed with Ward, the pugilist, a man who has been remarkable for uncommon agility, as well as strength and courage; his language illiterate, his countenance and manner vulgar, yet to a certain degree pleasing, and his intellect remarkably quick. He was once so famous at fives, that he beat every opponent, with right, left, or back hand, by his extreme activity. He is now among the best players at billiards. The method practised by pugilists to bring themselves into condition, as they term it, is air and exercise, regular hours, not more than a pint of wine a day, lean meat, especially beef, and fowls, with few vegetables. This regimen may be instructive to persons wishing to recover activity and strength. Met Jew K., who, from his conversation and physiognomy, does not appear to grow more wise and placable as he grows older. Again invited me to renew my visits, which I do not intend, and spoke of the frequency of those of G., as I suspect, with exaggeration. Soon afterwards, I was in some danger of being run over by B. D., his son-in-law, driving furiously in a curricule. The coincidence of these rencontres was whimsical.

"25th. — Called on Stoddart; not at home. Received a letter from him complaining of marked disrespect from me. Answered by truly denying any such intentional behaviour. Godwin, Carlisle, and the two Tobins to dinner; Stoddart came in the evening. Carlisle spoke of a woman who had been five-and-twenty years in bed, from a cancerous disease, and who is still living.

"26th. — Saw J. Robinson, Sir Francis Burdett, and Este, at Debrett's. It is said in a newspaper, that Kotzebue is imprisoned by the Imperial government for his democratic principles. Mr. Aspin, who printed Fenwick's pamphlet on Coigley, called.

"27th. — T. North, Lord Thanet, &c. at Debrett's. The ravages of the yellow fever at Philadelphia and New York detailed in to-day's 'Chronicle.' Courtney says, he lately read in one of Dr. Franklin's letters a passage where the Doctor foretold epidemical diseases, if draining and cleanliness were not more carefully practised.

"28th. — Called to settle with S.; reminded him that the preface I wrote, and the proofs I read for him, while a prisoner him in Newgate, had I charged them, if charged at twelve as, would not have been more than a third of the value of my yet I had charged nothing, nor should, unless he contested a count. This induced him immediately to allow the balance the sale of my books. Papers at Debrett's. On Thursday 2nd, Fanny met the Miss Harts, drinking tea with Miss

 ; they are the daughters of Horne Tooke. Horne Tooke some pleasure in praising his daughters, which he sometimes by those equivocatory falsehoods which are one of his prinpleasures. Of the eldest, he says, 'all the beer brewed in ouse is of that young lady's brewing.' It would be equally ere he to say, all the hogs killed in this house are of that lady's killing; for they brew no beer. When a member of nstitutional Society, I have frequently heard him utter sen-
 , the first part of which would have subjected him to death law, but for the salvo that followed; and the more violent ere, thus contrasted and equivocatory, the greater was his t.

10th.—P. to dinner. Manuscript letters of James I., Prince
 ; &c. in the Museum. P. had been reading them; says character in which they are written is uncommonly beau-and that many of them addressed to Prince Henry were projectors and improvers with which that time abounded.
 delighted in patronising and encouraging them. P. of n that the high character given of Henry was well de-

December 5th.—Saw Cumberland's 'Word for Nature' first was much pleased. He too often unravels his whole fable, is slight enough, in the first or second acts. In this some uspense is preserved, and very much of those generous feel-which interest while they improve. His usual self-conceit xceedingly prominent in the prologue, and sufficiently so in ay. The epilogue was an incongruous farrago, and took much of the pleasant feeling the piece had left. It likewise gotistical. In the dialogue, he was guilty of his common a repeated play upon words, little better than quibbling; and not held in so much contempt, inferior perhaps to punning, ch it is but a meagre species. His characters of the term-wife, hen-pecked husband, and old officer, are repetitions of
 : that is, of Ironsides, with Sir Benjamin and Lady Dove.

in 'The Brothers;' except that in 'The Brothers,' if I remember rightly, the three characters are much better drawn. The and almost the sole, merit of the present comedy centres in youth Leonard, to whom all the rest are very properly made servient adjuncts. In this comedy, as in 'The Wheel of Fortune' there are some few impertinent excrescences. These two, however, have more of wholeness and simplicity in the fable than most others in the English language; of those at least because of their insipidity, are not forgotten. These are the thoughts that occur after having once seen the comedy. Perhaps when I read and consider it more attentively, I may correct my opinion. It was received.

"6th. — The papers to-day have been less favourable to the account given of Cumberland's comedy than I supposed would have been.

"7th. — Coming from Debrett's I met S., who likewise was unfavourably of Cumberland's comedy.

"8th. — Call from Mrs. —. She was much affected at being told by a tailor, who works for Mr. —, that my amanuensis reported my opinion of Mr. — to be, that he was not a very prudent principle. I replied, that if I had ever conveyed a thought to my amanuensis, which might be so interpreted, it was when dictating this diary, the contents of which I supposed he would have regarded as sacred, and not have repeated to the disturbance of a person named in it. I added, that the diary was intended as a memorandum of my present conduct, opinions, and intercourse to serve in future as a depository of facts, which both I and my friends might wish should be preserved. Many of them must doubtless be trifling, others may turn to use: and that this end is desired in our most insignificant actions. I told her that if by the way of principle, any planned intention to defraud was understood, I never had expressed such an opinion of Mr. —, because I had no such opinion; though his conduct was reprehensible, yet I was satisfied his intentions were honest and kind. The assessed value of the chief subject of conversation now at Debrett's. There was yesterday in the 'Chronicle' what was called 'a scale,' such as is the case, according to the proposed bill, that a man who has a hundred a year landed property, which will sell for (say) ten thousand pounds during his life, or leave five hundred a year to his descendants, is to pay fifty pounds per annum assessed

That a man of five hundred a year annuity, which will sell for only a small part of that sum, and, if not sold, leave nothing to escendants, must pay the same. And lastly, that a man making ve hundred a year by his profession, which, during life, will all for nothing, and leave nothing at his death, must still pay ty pounds annual assessment. Went with Fanny and Mrs. and Miss B. to Covent Garden, to a new comedy performed there, written by Reynolds, called 'Laugh when you Can.' A strange mixture it would be to compare it, as a whole, with Cumberland's; et it has sallies of humour which Cumberland cannot reach, and ill probably have a temporary popularity.

" 9th. — Called on Carlisle, who showed me a plan for a new school of anatomy.

" 11th. — Saw P. at Debrett's: told him my intention to go broad.

" 12th. — Mr. H. at Debrett's remarked that Canning's fine speech in the House of Commons was rather a reply to what Canning supposed Tierney would have said, than to what Tierney had said.

" 13th. — At Debrett's, Weld rallied Tarleton on his approaching marriage and military appointment. Spoke with me concerning Sheridan's opera. T., having quarrelled with S., swore he would never be friends again; for he never pulled off his hat to him in the street but it cost him fifty pounds, and if he trusted himself in the same room, a hundred. S. still supposed to be concerned in the Haymarket. At Opie's in the evening. Northcote present. Northcote animated, as usual. Related a comic conversation between himself and a frame-maker, who had never heard the name of Northcote, nor noticed it in the prints he had framed, though he remembered the names of Sir Joshua Reynolds, West, Opie, &c. After supper, stories of terror were related.

" One, of a lady waked from sleep, who suffered her lap-dog to lie at the foot of her bed, and, feeling something move, bid the dog lie still, at the same time stretching out her arm to feel him, but instead of a lap-dog, took hold of a hand; when a voice bid her lie still, make no noise, but deliver her keys. The lady was a woman of courage, and immediately complied; only requesting her daughter might not be disturbed, who was sleeping by her side. She, however, was mistaken; the daughter had heard the thieves, had risen, slipped on a night-dress, and, stealing into another room, gave the alarm, by which the thieves were secured.

"Another, of a bigoted old lady, who seeing thieves enter her apartment with lights, at midnight, exclaimed to her maid, who lay in the same room, 'Lie still, Betty, for now we shall see the salvation of the Lord!' imagining it was a celestial apparition. The thieves, however, were driven away by the fury of a poor man, maintained out of charity, who was half an idiot, and who, after the exploit, was made drunk every day, when he went to Plymouth, with drams given him by people, who bribed him to tell the story.

"A third, of a gentleman, that having put out his candle, going to bed, read, in blazing characters on his curtains, 'Confess thy sins; this night thy soul shall be required of thee.' On which the gentleman fell on his knees, and, as directed, began to confess his sins aloud: not from terror, but aware it was a trick, meant to terrify him, by a waggish young lady; and hearing a little bustle on the stair-head, truly supposed that she and others were there listening. He confessed, as the last and greatest of his sins, that he had seduced the young lady, and, if that might be pardoned him, he would never again be so heinously guilty. The joke was understood, and, of course, the lady laughed at, instead of the gentleman.

"A fourth, of a cook-maid, left alone in a country-house, which was attacked by several thieves on the night when she was sitting up, waiting the arrival of the family. The detail of this story —, who told it, did not know, except that the fears and courage of the girl being inflamed, finding them to be thieves, and that they were making their way by widening the aperture of the kitchen gutter, she took up a cleaver, and killed the first man that was creeping forward, then dragged the body away, imitated his voice, encouraged a second to come in, killed him, and thus destroyed them all; after which, growing frantic, she lighted up every room, smeared herself with blood, brandished her dreadful weapon, and was found marching about the house, and to and from the dead bodies, by the family, who, coming home in the middle of the night, were amazed at the lights from the windows first, and much more afterwards, when they beheld the scene within.

“ I am here reminded of a tragical story told me by the late Mrs. P., with the hero of which, one Alexander —, of Aberdeen, she was personally acquainted, having, while a child, seen him daily. A pretty girl, whom this man had seduced, had risen at two o'clock, with one or two others, to wash. While they were at their work, a whistle was heard, and the girl said, ‘That is Sandy; I will go and speak to him.’ She said this with a kind of wildness and terror in her look, and was persuaded not to go; but she said she must and would, come of it what might, as if herself foreboding some ill. She could not be withheld; but going, said, perhaps she should soon be back. The night passed away, however, and, instead of returning, if I remember rightly, she was never seen more. Her lover remained for some time in the place, till suspicion became so loud, that he thought proper to go abroad; for there was no proof to detain him, as no one could swear to a whistle, or knew what was become of the girl. After a lapse of years, he returned rich, but always deeply melancholy, and loving to be alone. This behaviour revived the memory of past events, and he was universally shunned, except by children, to whom he was particularly kind, and who therefore frequently played with him, and partook of the good things he gave them.

“ Discoursing at Opie’s, on the effects of terror, Northcote related, that two of his brothers were sitting by the fire, and as one of them slept, the other, by way of experiment, when he saw him about to wake, sat motionless, without appearing to breathe, and his eyes fixed on one object. The brother, who had been asleep, watched him as long as his patience could hold, and then spoke, but received no answer. He spoke again and again, but still the same fixed, motionless, and, as he began to dread, lifeless figure, sat before him. He was not a timid man, and the absurd joke ended without any bad consequences. But the picture which he afterwards gave of his own terror was a strong one. N. also told the following story:—A gentleman, followed by a servant in livery, rode into an inn in the West of England, one evening, a little before dusk. He told the landlord that he should be detained by business in that part of the country for a few days, and wished to know if there were any amusements going on in the town, to fill up the intervals of his time. The landlord replied, that it was their race and assize week, and that he would therefore be at no loss to pass away the time. On the gentleman’s making answer that this was lucky, for that he was fond of seeing trials, the other said, that a very interesting trial for a robbery would come on the next day, on which people's opinions were much divided, the evidence being very strong against the prisoner; but he himself persisting resolutely in declaring that he was in a distant part of the kingdom at the time the robbery was committed. His guest manifested considerable curiosity to hear the trial, but, as the court would probably be crowded, expressed some doubt of getting a place. The landlord told him, that there could be no difficulty in a gentleman of his appearance getting a place; but that, to prevent any accident, he would himself go with him, and speak to one of the headles. Accordingly, they went into court the next morning, and the gentleman was shown a seat on the bench. Presently after, the trial began. While the evidence was giving against him, the prisoner had remained with his eyes fixed on the ground, seemingly very much depressed; till, being called on for his defence, he looked up, and, seeing the stranger, he suddenly fainted away. This excited some surprise, and it seemed at first like a trick to gain time. As soon as he came to himself, on being asked by the judge the cause of his behaviour, he said, 'Oh! my lord, I see a person that can save my life; that gentleman (pointing to the stranger) can prove I am innocent; might I only have leave to put a few questions to him?' The eyes of the whole court were now turned on the gentleman, who said he felt himself in a very awkward situation to be so called upon, as he did not remember ever to have seen the man before, but that he would answer any question that was asked him. 'Well, then,' said the man, 'don't you remember landing at Dover at such a time?' To this the gentleman answered, that he had landed at Dover not long before, but that he could not tell whether it was on the day he mentioned or not. 'Well,' said he, 'but don't you recollect that a person in a blue jacket and trowsers carried your trunk to the inn?' To this he answered, that of course some person had carried his trunk for him, but that he did not know what dress he wore. 'But,' said the prisoner, 'don't you remember that the person, who went with you from the boat, told you a story of his being in the service, that he thought himself an ill-used man, and that he showed you a scar he had on one side of his forehead?' During this last question, the countenance of the stranger underwent a considerable change; he said he cer-ly did recollect such a circumstance ; and, on the man's putting hair aside, and showing the scar, he became quite sure that was the same person. A buzz of satisfaction now ran through court, for the day on which, according to the prisoner's account, this gentleman had met with him at Dover, was the same on which he was charged with the robbery in a remote county. The judge, however, could not be certain of the time, but said that he sometimes made memorandums of dates in his pocket-book, might possibly have done so on this occasion. On turning to his pocket-book, he found a memorandum of the time he landed at Calais, which corresponded with the prisoner's assertion. Being the only circumstance necessary to prove the alibi, the prisoner was immediately acquitted, amidst the applause and congratulations of the whole court. Within less than a month after the gentleman who came to the inn, attended by a servant in livery, the servant who followed him, and the prisoner who had been acquitted, were all three brought back together to the same place, for robbing the mail.

14th.—The assassination of Buonaparte, the subject at Debrett's.

15th.—Met Arthur B., who disbelieves the assassination of Buonaparte. It was much questioned at Debrett's. T. loudly stating it was impossible that a general officer, surrounded by staff, should be massacred. Tarleton already imagines himself and his staff in P. B. remarked to me on the triumphant success of the ministry, and their creatures, in announcing this intelligence. It is true enough, but party spirit never yet had any understanding.

16th.—Walked with Tobin into the park. Met various persons ; among others, S., the surgeon, as flighty and whimsical as a child. He walked with us ; dropped us ; then came up again ; another acquaintance, stopped with him, was presently with us again ; and after first saying I was a deep observer of men and manners, asked me of what profession was the man he met. I had only seen the man's face, and, cutting Addison's joke, desired to give me the red-hot poker out of his pocket, that I might show it as a first proof of my skill. He then said the man was a dentist. I replied, I was about to guess he was a doctor, and would have been tolerably near the mark. Tobin tells me Doctor does is again going to lecture at Bristol on health and its preservation; that he hates physicians, that physicians hate him, and that he wishes to teach each man to be the guardian of his own health. Thomas Wedgewood, Tobin says, is so afflicted with bad digestion, that he is obliged to take several hours' strong exercise every day. Shooting and turning are part of his amusements. Metaphysics, the study he most delighted in. I told Tobin I wished for a school of health, one principal branch of which should be exercise, and its proper direction, tending to move the limbs and muscles in all modes, by running, stooping, &c., and that social games, which should powerfully stimulate, ought to be practised; bowls, trap-ball, &c., in fine weather. Billiards, marbles, and whatever would engage the attention, and give variety of action, should be studied. I mentioned the above as those that first occurred to the memory. Parkinson, jun., a good mineralogist. His father was offered twelve thousand pounds, and the title of Baron for his son, by a German prince (of Hesse, I believe), for the Leverian Museum. It is intended to remove this museum into Bond Street, make scientific arrangements, &c., and exhibit it at half-a-crown, or by annual tickets. At present it does not quite pay the interest of the money. Parkinson, sen., a lawyer, acting chiefly as steward to various persons. Much talk with Tobin, concerning some manuscript pieces written by his brother, and not a little praised by him. Stoddart and Clementi to dinner. Read a scene from Lillo's 'Fatal Curiosity' to them. Agnes and Wilmot concerting the murder. Critical remarks by S. on the language. Called on N., who mentioned an attack made on him by T., editor of a magazine meant to rival his journal. The attack ignorant and artful. I advised either a perfectly good-tempered reply, or silence.

"17th.—Walked to Westminster, to inquire concerning the picture of Angelica and Medora, but could not find Mr. Bates. Unexpectedly met Colonel Barry at Debrett's, just come to town. Lord Wycombe, speaking of Lord Cornwallis, says, 'No man is more open in discussing any question, political, or appertaining to government, except such as relate immediately to his own office, and then no man more close.' G. related of one B., a gambler and famous billiard-player, that he was now in total discredit, after having lived in a very high style; to support which, he had been guilty of many notorious gambling frauds. He and one Captain — met one evening at billiards, and played a long rubber for 50*l.*, which B. easily won. The Captain said he had no more ney then, but would come the next night, and play him for his sum, for he was still convinced he was the better player. The ointment was made, and all the gamblers and sporting people, heard of it, flocked to the place. Bets to a large amount were laid every game; the Captain won, and emptied most of the stators' pockets: but the match was not finished, for he and quarrelled, abused each other in very gross language, pre- led to strike at each other with their cues, but avoided the vs by dodging, and separated in an apparently extreme heat. erson, however, who had been betting, happening to pass toward keley Square, saw B. and the Captain, under the wall of wdowne House, dividing the bank-notes and money of which y had robbed the bettors. B. was dealer to one —, who t a faro table; and three nights successively, a man came in ards the close of the play, staked a large sum on the card, and it, to the total amount of two thousand pounds. He made urther attempt, but was refused by the table-keeper. R. was pected, and discharged; and was soon after seen dining at the ern on Richmond Hill, with the man who had won the two usand pounds. Gamblers speak with most acrimonious rancour inst those of their own set who betray them. They delight in spiring against all the world besides; but bestow the epithets f, robber, rascal, &c. most plentifully when betrayed by one of mselves.

18th.—Conversed with E. at Debrett's concerning L., who left joint patentee of Drury Lane theatre, with landed property, houses, &c. of twelve hundred a year, or more. Married a en woman's daughter because she was tall; himself above six : and, in a very short time, was little better than a beggar; never made any figure, even as a spendthrift. He had last ht a benefit at the little theatre in the Haymarket; a poor house.

19th.—Breton at Debrett's, spoke of the tricks of Smithfield smen. He sent thirty head of cattle to market, came himself, nown to the salesman, and watched his proceedings; a number, lve I think, of bad cows were added to his thirty fat bullocks; whole sold together, and he paid the average price; but made salesman refund. Farmers are not allowed to sell for themselves; they must employ salesmen.

20th.—Mr. H. observed, that the ship Orient had been evil genius of the squadron of Brueys. It had prevented the going into the inner harbour. It would not suffer the squadron to anchor in very shallow water, and by blowing up in the battle did every kind of mischief.

"21st.—Conversed with Erskine, Sir Francis Burdett, R. Adair, Courtney, Este, and Weld. Erskine of opinion it was wrong to give up agitating the question of reform without doors, i. e. out of the House of Commons. He had before remarked that the people had lost all spirit, which I denied, and, on this occasion, reminded him that the leaders of the people had abandoned them in a cowardly manner, and then had called the people cowards. Sir Francis Burdett is inquiring into the number of persons imprisoned on suspicion, and their treatment, meaning to state the particulars to Parliament. Erskine, as a lawyer, has great talents, quick conceptions, acute feelings, and uncommon power over juries; but as a man of grand plans, and inflexible principles, he is far from ranking in the first class. I this day completed my fifty-third year.

"23rd. — Called on Sir William Beechey, who has lately given a delicacy of tint and reflected lights to the shaded side of his faces, which I think admirable; and, as far as my knowledge goes, peculiar to himself. He related the following anecdote of Serres, the ship painter. Serres took a picture or pictures of shipping; from England to the King of France, painted to commemorate some naval exploit of the French, and invited connoisseurs and artists to see his performance. Among the rest was the famous Vernet. Serres waited some time after Vernet had looked at the picture, till he became impatient to hear his opinion, hoping for praise, and fearing lest it should not be bestowed. 'How do you like my picture,' said he, 'Mr. Vernet?' 'Upon my word, sir,' replied Vernet, 'you paint ropes exceedingly well.' Nothing could be more satirical, or better mark the genius of the two men, than this reply. Vernet, like a man of genius, painted nature at large, and suggested her minutiae, but never gave them in detail. Serres was incapable of any thing but detail, in which he was uncommonly accurate. Serres thought he revenged himself on Vernet, by damning him for a fool, that had never known how to paint a ship, which, in his sense, was true enough. He could not paint every shroud, rope, and tackle, &c., all which Serres had laboriously studied.

"24th. — Mr. — M. P. related an incredible anecdote of the Prince of Sicily,—the present prince royal, if I do not mistake,—that, being betrothed to an archduchess of Austria, and, as they could not meet, Germany, &c. being overrun by the French, being married by proxy, eight months after the marriage he ordered his attendants to provide child-bed linen; supposing she must be brought to bed in a month, though he had never seen her. I said it was incredible, and he answered it was seriously asserted as a fact.

“25th. — Mr. C. surprised me much by a very liberal and friendly offer of the loan of two or three hundred pounds; thinking it might be want of money that induced me to sell my effects and go abroad. I answered, one motive was, that of being already in debt to persons who never reminded me of it, which I could endure no longer, much less to incur fresh obligations of the same kind; but that his offer was a strong testimony of the goodness of his own heart. That I was likewise desirous of familiarising myself and my daughter with the true idiom of foreign languages, and the manners of the people; also of reducing my expenses, and of absenting myself till certain prejudices in the public mind, respecting me, should subside.

“26th. — Sent the three first acts of ‘The Lawyer’ to Mr. Harris. Walked with B——r to see P., whose hands are excessively burned by extinguishing fire, which had caught his wife’s clothes, and must certainly have burned her to death. His resolution was considerable. When the wife of B——r was sitting for her picture, Beechey related the following anecdote. At the time of the last procession, he was painting K. G., who asked if he intended to see the sight: B. answered in the affirmative. ‘It will be very fine, B., very fine.’ The day after, when sitting, he again said, ‘Well, B., did you see the procession, B.?’ The painter answered he had. ‘How did you like it, B.?’ ‘How did you like it?’ ‘Exceedingly.’ ‘Had you a good sight, B.?’ ‘A very good one. I saw it from a one pair of stairs, on the top of Ludgate Hill.’ ‘That must have been very fine, very fine indeed, B. I wish I had been in your place. I should like to have seen it myself. But I could see nothing but the back of the coachman.’ Went to ‘The Jew and the Doctor’ in the evening, which is a tolerably good farce.

“27th. — Mr. —, at Debrett’s, wished the Orangemen of Ireland might raise another rebellion, and be all cut off and totally destroyed. Such is the miserably vicious state of the minds of the two opposite parties. Nothing will satisfy either, but extirpation and blood of their opponents. Dined with Mr A Mrs. Remorande came to consult him on law business. husband, an Irish officer, in the French service, was guillotine Robespierre ; and she, finding means to secrete 500*l.*, remi the money to England. The person afterwards refused paym She employed an attorney, and was told by another, one the first intended to cheat her ; and prevailed upon her to let continue the suit. She complied, and he soon obtained the mo but instead of receiving it, as she expected, an information laid against her, and she was taken on suspicion before the I of Portland. Her story being heard, the villanous artific M. was seen through, and she was released. He used t endeavours, and she was taken before the Westminster just but again set free. M. had given instructions, in his handwriting, to his servant, how to proceed in accusing These were obtained ; he was prosecuted, and promised, if would stop proceedings, the money should be repaid. Her co incautiously took his word ; and as it was a criminal prosecu when it was dropped, he was no longer in danger, and mocked credulity. He was arrested, however, for the debt, and put in Fleet prison, where he now lies. This woman's story in F was still more remarkable. The outlines of it were these. papers announcing her husband's death had arrived, and tragedy was generally known to the inhabitants of St. Omer's not to her. The people around her were afraid to tell her She is a woman of quick faculties, observed something remark unusual, gloomy, and strange in their countenances, and coul conceive the reason. One of them advised her to go to the because she was in need of amusement. This ridiculous advic innocently followed ; and her acquaintance at the play we astonished at the indecency of such conduct, that she came : uncommonly agitated by behaviour she thought so affront Still she found the same mournful faces, and at last conjured of them, in God's name, to tell her what was the matter. advised her, if she had any property, to secure it, for she w danger. This alarmed her suspicions concerning the true c and they were confirmed by another, who answered her question, by replying, 'il est parti, he is gone.' The fa tyrant, Le Bon, soon afterward came to St. Omer's. Her p as seized ; her property confiscated ; her two children were torn from her ; and she was ordered to prison. In the delirium of her distress, she braved this demon, called him Scelerat, and said, though he aimed at her life, she should live to see him cut off for his crimes. She was removed, however, to Amiens, among persons who were soon to be sacrificed, and her hair was shorn for that purpose. But at this period, Robespierre himself fell ; she escaped ; and, by an odd coincidence of circumstances, when Le Bon was on his trial, she happened to come to the town where he was tried, went to the court to see the man who had done her so much mischief, and entered it (he being on his defence) at the moment he was describing the fury with which she had resisted what he called the execution of the law. She instantly mounted on a seat ; showed herself to the court ; and called, in the most impressive manner, to be heard. The judge was proceeding to commit her for disturbing the proceedings, till she announced her name, and the court then listened to her with the utmost attention. The impression she made was so great, that Le Bon sunk dejected, and offered no further defence to that charge. She supposes him to have been a man as extraordinary for his abilities, as for his cruelty and rapaciousness. M. Martinet, an emigrant, came to tea. In one respect, his was a similar story. He had taught French, with great reputation, in the university of Cambridge, where he had never agitated or concerned himself with political questions, yet an information being laid against him, he was ordered out of the kingdom. In consequence of letters written by noblemen, divines, and respectable men of all parties, this order was revoked ; but he is not permitted to teach in Cambridge, consequently he has lost an income, which he had established by his abilities, of between 100*l.* and 200*l.* a year.

"28*th.* — Met Sir L. C. at Debrett's, and spoke to him to recommend N.'s academy. Was pleased with Pulteney's speech against the Income Bill. Mr. G. Dyer drank tea with us, and told me of poems well written by Lord Holland. Imitations of 'Juvenal,' one of them called 'Secession,' in praise of his uncle, Charles Fox. B. asserted two people had perished by the frost in the prison, nick-named the Bastille. Sir L. C. agreed with me in disapproving Tierney's motion against the editor of the 'Times.'

"29*th.* — Letter from Harris refusing to accept bills for me.

Wrote in answer. Informed Courtney of B.'s story; he had heard it of one person starved, but with aggravating circumstances that render it incredible.

"31st. — Letter from Harris. Spoke to Lord Holland, requesting him to promote Mr. N's plan for an intended academy, which he promised to do.

"1799.

"January 1st. — Lord Wycombe at Debrett's. Converses with him yesterday on the Orleans Gallery; and with Courtney on the subject of solitary confinement. Northcote present. Conversation chiefly on the perfectibility of man, Shakspeare, and painting.

"2nd. — Mr. Harris called, and proposes to put the comedy in rehearsal nearly as soon as it is finished. Contended with Lord H. at Debrett's, against precedents, and in favour of the patriotism of the people; which points he did not obstinately maintain. Spoke with P. on the subject of 'The Lawyer.' Every body speaks of Boaden's play, 'Aurelio and Miranda,' first performed on Saturday, the 29th ult., at Drury Lane theatre. Dined with Tobias Barnard's Inn, No. 7., his brother, Mr. W., and E. The discourse on Christianity, causation, &c., and politics. T. one of those who defend the present tyranny of the French government from the enthusiasm with which they admired the late struggle of the nation for freedom.

"3rd. — Mr. C. brought me a hundred pounds as a loan. Seems very desirous I should not quit the kingdom. Accepted draft for ninety pounds, at two months, drawn by Birch, for Teniers and other pictures. Had a dispute with Weld concerning the frost of 1789 and that of 1795. I was wrong. Weld jocularly accused me of the trouble I took to have myself hanged; alluding to my surrendering myself when indicted for high-treason, though my prosecutors seemed unwilling to take me into custody.

"4th. — M. Martinet, a French emigrant, called for the first time, the gentleman mentioned on the 27th ult. Billiards with stranger. One G. was at play in the morning with a youth the name of Frazer, and played barefacedly ill, to encourage his meaning no doubt to lead him on and plunder him.

"5th. — E. at Debrett's. He used to be stiff and distant with me, he now seems to make it a point of being familiar. A great, and not an ill talker; little depth of thought, but much lucid description. Sometimes with a happy poetic word. Weld, in a conversation with me, gave a high character of Lord H., in which, I think, there was little if any exaggeration. His speech to the Lords against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, as reported by the newspapers, has great and solid merit. His delivery, I fear, is not very impressive. I likewise fear he has not sufficient vehemence of feeling to become a man of genius. G. has again been at play with young Frazer, and to-day thought proper to win a few games. The match is to be continued on Monday.

"6th. — After writing the last and chief scene in my comedy, yesterday and this morning, part of it from notes, but chiefly the labour of the two days, I walked with Fanny, and Louisa Mercier, into the park, where, though it was a quick thaw, numbers were skating; and had the day been clear, the morning picture would have been amusing. Met General Maitland, had a salute; a nod from Lord R. S. on horseback.

"7th. — Again transcribed, with additions and corrections, the last scene. Lord Holland, General Maitland, Mr. Weld, Mr. Hare, the Duke of Bedford, &c., at Debrett's. The hardships of the Income Bill discussed.

"8th. — Wrote the first scene of the fifth act, the substance of which I had in my memory; and had the whole act transcribed, and the comedy sent to Mr. Harris. Saw P. at Debrett's, and spoke to him of my intended epilogue.

"9th. — Harris called about three o'clock, much satisfied with the comedy, but advising some curtailments and slight alterations.

"10th. — Wrote to Harris concerning the proposed alterations.

"11th. — Made alterations in the Tradesman-scene, and returned the comedy to Harris, that Lewis might read Headlong before I curtail the Bailiff-scene in the third act. [This comedy came out at Drury Lane (much altered) in 1803, ran eleven nights, ill performed, and entitled, 'Hear both Sides.' June, 1808.]

"12th. — Went with Fanny and Louisa to Holman's new comedy, first time, 'The Votary of Wealth,' a piece in which there is much to blame, and but little to commend. Heard Mrs. Atkins in the first act of 'Rosina.' M. Le F. and his wife in the same box; he pretended to regret we each had visited when the other was not at home, and to wish a more intimate acquaintance; but I doubt his sincerity. He is a man of the world, and his world has not been of the purest kind.

"13th. — Called on P., who read me quotations made by Belsham from 'Davenant,' something like miraculously picturing the political state and government of the kingdom, though written I believe, at the beginning of this century. Left the manuscript of 'The Lawyer' with him to read. Called on M. Martinet not at home, and on Mr. Nicholson. Mr. Godwin brought the manuscript with further remarks, of the same temper and complexion as his first: on which subject, as nearly as I can recollect we had the following conversation. H. 'The first part of your criticism which I have read has, I own, both pained and surprised me. When you brought your tragedy to me, you gave minute detail of the rules I was to observe in criticising your work, that you might properly benefit by my remarks, which rules I have not yourself in the least attended to. One of the first of them was, not to find fault in such an absolute and wholesale style might at once kill your ardour, and make you, if not disgusted with your work, yet so doubtful as at once to damp all further progress. Yet, having read mine, you come with a sledge-hammer criticism, describe it as absolutely contemptible, tell me it must be damned, or if it should escape, that it cannot survive five nights; that the characters and plot are but transcripts of myself, and that every body will say it is the garrulity of an old man. I am very aware that the judgment of an author on a work of his own, when he has lately finished, is extremely fallible; but a judgment he has and must have, and I am firmly persuaded that this comedy (meaning "The Lawyer") contains some of the strongest writing I have ever produced; and I stake my judgment, as far as the judgment of an author, under the circumstances I have described, can be staked, that instead of being damned, it will meet with no considerable applause.' G. 'I thought it my duty to speak my thoughts plainly. The opinion I have delivered I delivered coolly, after due reflection, and I was desirous you should understand perfectly what my feelings were. My language was unqualified, but there is this distinction between my critique and yours, which I complained. I have used no triumphing banter, when you did.' H. 'Not in that part of my remarks which was general; nor ever, but when I supposed it would make you more clearly perceive the defect which I wished you to amend, than by any other method I could take.' G. 'There is another difference between us. Though I certainly give myself credit for intellect powers, yet I have a failing which I have never been able to overcome. I am so cowed and cast down by rude and unqualified assault, that for a time I am unable to recover. You, on the contrary, I consider as a man of iron.' H. 'It is true, I have been so hardened in sufferance, by the difficulties I have had to overcome, that when such attacks are made upon me I think I may say, however egotistical it may sound, I can, in the language of Shakespeare, shake them from me "as the lion shakes the dewdrops from his mane." Yet if you imagine that sensibility is destroyed in me, the mistake is strange and unaccountable, considering how well you know me. On the present occasion, I lay wakeful and ruminating full three hours on the injustice and wrong nature of your remarks. At length I recollected the folly of such uneasiness, created chiefly by the pain it gave me to think you could act so improperly, and I then recounted to myself your great virtues, and how very trifling such blemishes are, when placed in comparison with them. This, as it ought, acted like a charm, and almost immediately calmed my perturbation. But it is right I should inform you I had this perturbation; and that though I can overcome feeling, it is still as quick and vigorous as ever.' We then walked, and conversed on other subjects till dinner-time.

"14th. — Inquired of King, auctioneer, his terms of selling books: they are ten per cent., not including tenpence in the pound king's taxes, but all other expenses, except that of conveying them to the auction room. Lord Wycombe at Debrett's; read to me the strange account inserted in the 'Times' of to-day, of Lord Camelford's attempt to go over to France; and commented on the pretended purity of ministers, who have lately conferred the command of a ship (a frigate as I recollect) on this madman. L. related to me a whimsical story of a physician, who one night hearing lamentable groans and cries, went to search whence they proceeded, found a man and woman, drunk, thrown out of an overturned cart, hastened to a public-house to get aid, and in his care had them put to bed together; but returning the next morning, found the man in a rage at having slept with such a companion; and the woman making an intolerable uproar, weeping and reproaching, asserting that her character was ruined, and that he must and should marry her: which accordingly the good-natured fool was persuaded to do. Called on Christie; his terms for pictures are seven and a half per cent., all expenses whatever included.

"15th. — Met Mr. P. at Phillips's auction rooms. Thinks highly of 'The Lawyer.' Suggested an alteration that should omit the Bailiff in the fourth act. Will consider it. Conversed with Lord Wycombe at Debrett's.

"16th. — Mr. Harris called; advised alterations in 'The Lawyer,' which I expect will be essential. His ideas, though crude, have awakened reflection. He promised to put no other comedy in rehearsal, till he had my answer within a fortnight.

"17th. — Made notes for altering the character of Sir Ralph Lord Wycombe, Marquis of Townsend, Rans, &c., at Debrett's. Read the three last acts of 'The Lawyer' to Louisa and Fanny; their feelings were strong, yet from their variations I could discover some defects. Reading such manuscripts is a good experiment.

"18th. — Account in to-day's 'Morning Chronicle' of the Norwegian that died at the age of 160, enjoying his faculties to the last. His name, I think, Surrington. Girton, a landscape designer, looked at my pictures, and praised them highly. After the Wilsons, his attention was most deeply attracted by the landscape by Artois.

"19th. — Barry, the painter, R. A. spent the evening with us. His conversation, as usual, rapturous in praise of the arts. Speaking and, I believe, thinks highly of Fanny's attempts at drawing: not of her knowledge or execution, but of her feeling for character and beauty. Saw Mr. Wheeler going to Fulham, who was astonished and rejoiced, having supposed me dead. Asked me to dine with him in the country.

"20th. — Received a begging letter from a person signing himself J. K., the chief features of which are ignorance and servility. I thought it my duty to refuse his request. I learn he intends to read lectures on law, in which political government is to be introduced, and the established systems of this country highly praised. Expressed the pain I felt, that a man of such superior powers should act so false a part, and so contrary to his conviction of which I must, in all human probability, be able to form a tolerably accurate opinion, from the many conversations I have had with him. His judgment was (and, doubtless, still is, for his faculties are in their full vigour) so clear, his perceptions so penetrating trating, and his opinions so decided, that I can conceive no possibility of their being so totally changed. Read Dryden's Translation, Ode 29. b. 1., of 'Horace,' part of 'Macflecnoe,' and his 'Verses on Young Statesmen,' 1680, aloud.

"21st. — Report at Debrett's, that Paul Benfield is ruined. Was told he went out to India a carpenter, got employment as a builder, learned the art of making money breed, and came home worth 300,000*l*.

"22nd. — The union of Ireland is now the whole subject of political discourse. Ministry seems determined, and their opponents hope, though faintly, it may put an end to their power.

"23rd. — Met Sir F. B. in Bond Street, who reminded me of my promise; then H., who would not see me, ('tis the fashion of these folks to those they think their inferiors,) and afterwards C. Grey, M. P., who was less aristocratic, and gave me a nod. Lord S.'s 'Address' in the 'Chronicle' and 'Post.' T. calls him mad. I expressed a different opinion to Weld, who agreed, and said there was method in his madness.

"24th. — Met General H. again. He spoke to me, for it was not in Bond Street, and his pride had no alarms. Such pride is pitiable, and excites to resentment; but to resent would be equally weak.

"25th. — At Debrett's. General H. described the black chief of St. Domingo, Toussaint, after General Maitland. He is a little man, about fifty, toothless, lively of temper, and ambitious.

"26th. — Call from Watts; another from Tobin, who had lent me 'The Sorcerer,' translated from Weber. He and his brother praised it as the first production in the world. I told him, I thought the author a man of genius, but that his book is written in a taste no less disgusting than immoral, besides being deficient in several of the essential parts of composition, as, a choice of subject, conduct of the fable, probability, &c. Attwood came and told me the performers gave high applause at the reading of 'The Old Clothesman.' Met Knight, who is to play Florid, and who wanted to tell me it as a secret, which I refused to hear. Dibdin, comedian, and author of 'The Jew and the Doctor,' was with him. I like him, because he spoke so earnestly in praise of the virtuous principles of his brother. They are illegitimate sons of Dibdin, the musical composer, whose conduct towards them is highly reprehensible. The young man said he had seen his father so seldom.

that, having weak eyes, he should not know him if he met him in the street. I invited him to my house. The news at Debrecht was the failure in the Irish Parliament, of the attempt at a union and not only there, but in the streets, it was the subject of general conversation. All whom I heard mention it, rejoiced. Naples they say, is in the possession of the French; the king having fled with eight thousand troops to Sicily, after twenty thousand others had laid down their arms to eight thousand French. The substance of this I suppose to be true.

"28th. — Finished the alterations in my comedy. Debrecht full. The conduct of the Irish parliament relating to the union the whole subject of political conversation. Read a criticism 'La Decade Philosophique,' No. 8. An. 7., — on a French translation of 'Hugh Trevor,' containing great praise, and some point blame. The chief articles of the latter are, — that the plan proposed is incomplete [true]; that some of the conversations are too long [true]; that my satire on professions is unfounded [false]; that I have not put my morality sufficiently in action [false against the law part excepted]; that probability is not quite enough regarded [perhaps not]; and that, to make Trevor so suddenly wealthy man, is entirely in the novel style [true; blamable]. The following are the concluding remarks: 'Malgré ces défauts qu'on peut reprocher, comme nous l'avons vu, à beaucoup de romans mêmes très-estimés, celui-ci mérite assurément d'être distingué par la justesse des observations, la vérité des tableaux et des caractères, le naturel du dialogue, la peinture exacte des mœurs et des ridicules. En un mot, c'est l'ouvrage d'un penseur, d'un homme de talent d'un observateur habile et exercisé, d'un ami des mœurs, et de vertu; disons encore d'un écrivain patriote, hardi défenseur des droits sacrés du peuple, et de telles productions sont toujours faites pour être bien accueillies.'

"29th. — Called on Opie; saw a portrait, whole length, of Lady, excellent. News of a second defeat of government in Ireland 109 to 104 against the union. Pitt, in answer to Sheridan, on the debate here on that subject, said, Sheridan seemed determined to have the last word; to which Sheridan replied, he was satisfied with having the last argument. When Dundas brought the seal bag, containing the proofs which are to be examined to show the necessity of a union, Sheridan, seeing there was not much in it, jocularly said to Dundas, 'Confess the truth; is there any thing that bag, except the report the committee are to bring up?' H——, M. P. related these as extraordinary witticisms. The one was a ready reply; the other, a sarcastic question, naturally resulting from his knowledge of the practices of people in office: nothing more. Sent my comedy to Harris, with a letter. Called on Northcote.

" 30th. — Sat to Mr. Opie, first sitting for my portrait, intended for Colonel Barry. Mr. G. has a portrait of me painted by Opie, which was exhibited last year, a most admirable painting and likeness. Received a letter from Harris. A very excellent sonnet in to-day's 'Herald,' on Winter. General H. told me, that Burns, who has written a pamphlet on the union, cites an expression, which is become proverbial in Ireland, i. e. 'Put an Irishman on the spit, and an Irishman will be found to turn it.'

" 31st. — Second sitting to Opie. He related an anecdote of a man in Cornwall, who being half drunk, and near a dreadful precipice, suddenly fell, but happened to catch with his hands; on which he began to pray, in a confused and terrified manner, till he was so exhausted that he could hold no longer, and at last loosed his hold; but scarcely descended a yard, being not quite so far on his road as the precipice; from which, if he had fallen, he must probably have been dashed to pieces. The disappointment must have been an odd sensation. Opie knew the man. S., a painter, told us of his journey over Mount Cenis, when those winter winds, characteristically called Tormento by the Italians, prevailed, which will not let the snow rest till it becomes lodged in cavities, filling them up, and making one even surface, dangerous to the lives of the most experienced guides. S. has been in India, where he was painter to the Mogul; and dignified with a Persian title, appointing him a general, and calling him the Royal Falcon of War, though he was in no other capacity than that of painter; but such cut-throat titles are there the only honourable distinctions, according to him, that are conferred.

" February 1st. — Dr. B. and — loud in praise of Dr. Drennan's pamphlet against Pitt. Third sitting to Opie. Called on Birch, who thinks Phillips gets better prices for pictures than Christie. Mr. and Mrs. Opie, Mr. and Mrs. Perry, Marian, Miss Barkley, daughter of Sir Robert, Northcote, and Sir Francis Bourgeois, in the evening. On the whole a pleasant party.

" 2nd. — Fourth sitting to Opie, a short one, and only for the coat. A report at Debrett's of the massacre of the Neapolitan nobility by the lazzaroni. Conversed with Lord Wycombe on the native ferocity of the Irish. Conjectures run high, that Pitt will breed a serious civil war in that country. Read three acts of my comedy to S. It is still capable, and indeed in want, of great improvements.

"4th. — Mr. Harris came by appointment, and we were mutually of opinion further alterations would greatly improve the comedy. Sale of Stuart, the artist's, pictures at Phillips's rooms.

"5th. — Este, Dr. Towers, Parry, jun. at Debrett's. Towers, a character worth drawing. Drank tea with P., who wished me to mention manuscript travels written by Brown to Robinson.

"6th. — The foot walk in Hyde Park one sheet of ice, on which, not being aware, had a severe fall. No news at Debrett's. Letter from Knight to Attwood, declining to sing 'The Joys of Eating,' &c., in 'The Old Clothesman.' Russian leather. Mr. Breton said the report was, that the recent death of the Duke of L. was occasioned by poison, self-administered. This is probably as unfounded as another report, which proves to be false, that Lord C. had lost seventy thousand pounds to the Duke of B., and had then destroyed himself. Lord Cowper is alive, and the duke says he never spoke to him in his life. It is true, indeed, the Duke of L. had ruined himself by gaming, and had endeavoured to drink away the remembrance of it.

"7th. — Wrote to Mr. Harris concerning Knight's song, &c. Nothing at Debrett's.

"8th. — Pitt at present thought insincere for pretending to persist in the measure of a union. List of Wakefield's jury from Mr. Foulkes.

"9th. — Finished my second alteration of 'The Lawyer.' Lord D. at Debrett's; of opinion that the union is a dangerous affair to Pitt. The death of Mr. Rans of Moorhall, with whom I had some slight acquaintance, announced in the papers. Bought the Crucifixion, a Caracci, highly finished, at Phillips's, the property of Pugh, a surgeon, who gave eighty pounds, or guineas, for it. A Metzsu sold for ninety-six guineas. The subject, a man on horse-back, with host and hostess at an alehouse door; bought by a young man related to Lord Fitzwilliam.

"11th. — Sent my comedy and a letter to Mr. Harris, stating the price I required. He refused, and immediately returned the

edy. Borrowed and repaid 18*l.* 16*s.* to Mr. Robinson, and 60*l.* a month, of Mr. S.

12*th.* — Sat to Opie. Wrote to Mr. P., informing him that ing seen Mr. Robinson, if Mr. Brown will send his manuscript, the price, Mr. Robinson would return an answer. Read anuscript of Mr. Tobin, jun.

13*th.* — Agreed with Mr. Phillips, auctioneer, to sell the whole y effects at five per cent., including all charges, except that I to remove books, prints, and pictures to his sale-room at my expense. Had a second fall on the unthawed snow, by which spinal bone is so sore I can hardly walk. Phillips, speaking of nt Kelly, characterised him as uncommonly liberal, and a great r of the arts. Phillips sold his library, and asked permission ntroduce some very indifferent books of his own, which he es- ted at forty pounds. The count disliking this, took the books he estimate, sent them to Stockholm, had a printed catalogue xem, and sold them by auction. This was a thing totally new ae country, and drew numbers of people, some of them from a siderable distance. The books sold for 120*l.*, and the count itted the money to Phillips.

14*th.* — Wrote Finale and a new song for Incledon, in 'The Clothesman.' The dishonourable proceedings of Boyd and field, the topic of the day. The justification of Boyd, a lame, ather a condemning tale. Saw P.; informed him of what had ed with Harris.

15*th.* — Sat to Opie.

17*th.* — Messrs. G., Clementi, Master Field, Mr. and Mrs. Opie, and Mrs. F. to dinner. Field played a concerto and other gs of his own composition. Is a youth of genius, for which Cle- ti loves, admires, and instructs him; highly to his own honour.

18*th.* — The opinion that Pitt has again lost a favourable op- unity of treating with France is pretty general.

20*th.* — Sat to Opie. Called on Sharp, and paid him for his t of —, which he said, if I kept, would become of great e, for it was the last on such a subject, meaning the destruc- of war, that would ever be published. Guessing the reason is whimsical assertion, I mentioned Brothers*, of whom he d in his usual style. The wisdom of man, he said, counter-

* A fanatic, who, in 1793, proclaimed himself the apostle of a new religion, are out that he was the "Nephew of the Almighty," &c. &c. He closed eer in Bedlam.

acting the wisdom of the Creator, had occasioned all our miseries but the tongue of wisdom was now subdued,—meaning Egypt which was not only a slip of land resembling a tongue, but the place in which the learning of the world originated. Thus, by the help of a pun and a metaphor, he had double proof, which I accept as indubitable. Syria, Palestine, and all these countries are soon to be revolutionised; and those who do not take up arms against their fellow men, are to meet at the grand millenium. The earthquake is still to happen, and the peaceable, even if uninspired, are all to be saved. So that I, being one of them, we temples to tumble over my head, should find some miraculous means or rafter, or something else equally wonderful, to save me from being crushed. I asked him, as I had formerly done, why the earthquake did not happen at the time positively appointed! Brothers; and he said, that unless I were one of the inspired, was a thing he could not explain. Last summer he had retired to a lonely place near or at Kilburn; and there he himself had been absolutely favoured with a revelation, communicating to him personally, beyond all doubt, the revolutions that are immediately to happen. He is a worthy and excellent man, and, in spite of his insanity, has an acute, strong, and inquiring mind. Notwithstanding my cross-questioning him, he has a strong desire to make a convert of me, and, knowing the principles of peaceful benevolence which I hold, has no small hopes of succeeding. He was happy at the idea of having more talk on the subject, though both plainly and ironically, in conversing with him, treated it as it deserves, except that I forbear as much as I can to wound him. He said he was greatly gratified that, though I argued against Brothers, I never called him rascally impostor, and other abusive epithets common in the mouths of his opponents. Laughed with me, at Debrett's, at T.'s account, some time ago, of the precious stone, or rocky fragment, that was rained on his estate — said, T. was only half mad, and that vanity was the possessing demon.

“21st.—Sat to Opie. Lord Wycombe brought the report of Debrett's of the loss of the Proserpine frigate, with Mr. Greenville, his suite, and the whole crew. Sent Mrs. — a one pound note, as a present relief.

“22nd.—Argued at Debrett's against the immorality of invective, for which I consider Mr. Wakefield as very blamable. I received a note from Mr. —, asking, in the name of a friend at some pictures in my sale, which I refused, as a public declaration, and for other reasons.

25th. — Met R. A., who walked with me up Bond Street. believes the loss of Grenville. Fox still determined on retirement. Tobin called, and inquired my thoughts on his brother's manuscript, which I gave him.

26th. — Sent the following notice to the commissioners for the new Bill: — 'I have no income: that is, I have neither real nor personal property, that brings me either rent or interest. My income has always been the produce of my labour; and that produce has been so reduced, by the animosity of party spirit, that I find myself obliged to sell my effects for the payment of my debts, that I may leave the kingdom till party spirit shall subside.'

27th. — Sat to Mr. Opie.

28th. — Sat to Opie. Sir L. C., at Debrett's, glad to see me: a man of unaffected manners, no pride, or as little, perhaps, as a man of wealth and title can have, and with patriotic and benevolent intentions. Lord Wycombe walked with me down Piccadilly, to view after my picture of Angelica and Medoro.

March 1st. — Sat to Opie. Northcote there, who warmly praised his whole-length of Mrs. Price, and his Old Soldier, and dined with Beer. Phillips came, read the catalogue, and approved the lotting of the pictures. Called and saw his Wouvermans' working. Parry, jun. is given to hope for a verdict in his favour, Erskine.

2nd. — Sat to Mr. Opie. Aided to catalogue the German pictures.

3rd. — Louisa and Theresa to breakfast. Spying to tea. Inquired Colonel Barry of the business of to-morrow, viz., my marriage with Louisa, and received his hearty congratulations.

He had seen my portrait, was highly pleased, and gave Opie a gift on his banker.

5th. — Went after breakfast, at ten, and sat to Mr. Drummond, in Lisle Street, Soho, at the request of the proprietors of the Monthly Mirror. Taken in crayons, size of life. A call from him: he told me, they (meaning his friend Mr. Brown and himself) had closed with Cadell for a thousand guineas; that is, had bought the copyright of 'Brown's Travels into Egypt, Darfoor, &c.,' for that sum.

6th. — Went a second time, and sat to Drummond.

'8th.—Called on Opie; but the morning so clouded after of snow, that it was too dark for him to paint, in the almost finished state of my portrait.

"9th.—Sat to Opie. A snowy and very bad day for the picture-sale. Difficulties made by —, the auctioneer, concerning the prices marked by me, though he had himself required I mark them. Thirty-seven lots of my pictures bought in.

"10th.—Mrs. Holcroft visited by Mrs. and Miss B., Mrs. P., and by Mr. and Mrs. Opie in the evening. Mr. I the traveller, called.

"12th.—Walked with Louisa in search of lodgings. I to dinner, and accompanied me, Sophia, and Louisa, to the Drury Lane. 'The Secret' and 'Feudal Times,' both of very dull and indifferent."

END OF DIARY.

CHAP. IX.

MR. HOLCROFT soon after went abroad. On his arrival at Hamburg, he went to lodge at the house of his daughter and husband, Mr. Cole, who was settled there in trade. He afterwards went to reside at the house of —, where he paid five pounds per week; and as his remittances from England were often interrupted, he would have been reduced to great distress, had been for the generous exertions of a stranger, a Mr. Schuhr. This gentleman, who was a merchant, advanced 250*l.* to Holcroft, on his note of hand. The first literary attempt Mr. Holcroft made after he was settled on the continent. This was to set up a journal ("The European Repository" containing an account of the state of foreign literature, and notes of celebrated characters. It only reached the first number.

It is certain that Mr. Holcroft's introductions, and his connections with literary men abroad, would have afforded opportunity for executing such a work well, had it met with encouragement. While at Hamburg, he visited Klopstock, Sander, &c. &c. On his first introduction to Klopstock, the laboured to show the superiority of the German to every ge in conciseness ; and challenged Mr. Holcroft to translate equal conciseness into English. To which he replied, that work might be easily supposed to overcome Holcroft, but that English language ought not to suffer on that account. He told Holcroft a story of Voss, the celebrated classic ; that at a time he was too ill even to hear a scholar read and parse a few of the classics, familiar as they were to him, he was still able to persevere to continue his translation of Ovid in hexameters, and find relief from this laborious task. When Baron Stolberg (superintendent of the academy) came to visit him, he hid his anxiety lest he should be accused of neglect of duty, or blamed for neglecting his health. Sander, a Dane by birth, informed Mr. Holcroft that "The Road to Ruin," and "The Deserted Daughter," had been translated into the Danish language, and that the latter was the most popular of the pieces brought out the preceding year at Copenhagen.

The admiration of the Germans for English literature, and their contempt for the French, are well known. Molière is the only one among the latter to whom they allow much genius. Their notions of excellence are indeed rather hypercritical than common.

They seem in general to assign the highest stations to the great men, but their list of great men is short. There are only a few whom they consider as poets, that is to say, inventors of a new name, namely, Homer, Dante, Shakspeare, and Goethe. Why they would have this high rank assigned him, I do not know. He is held by the Germans themselves far above Schiller. Mr. Holcroft, while abroad, translated his poem of "Herman and Dorothea." From the author to the translator on this subject, will be found among the letters at the end of the volume. Mr Holcroft, while he was at Hamburg, finished and sent over the comedy "Near both Sides," and his translation of "Deaf and Dumb," which were afterwards acted with success at Drury Lane.

On his departure from England, he had renounced all idea of speculation and connoisseurship. He however attended several sales, but without attempting to bid. One day as he was walking along the street, his attention was caught by a small box, which lay among some lumber at a broker's shop. He stopped, and asked the price of it, and was answered three guineas. Holcroft made no bargain, but determined to go home, and get Holcroft to come and look at it, to see whether any one else must not be as much struck with it as he was. On re-examining the picture, his confidence in its being an original increased, and he paid the money for it. As he was returning home in triumph with the picture under his arm, he met Mercier (Mrs. Holcroft's father), who had himself been a dabbler in pictures, and who, laughing, exclaimed, "A ce trait je connois mon sang!"

The first step being got over, they consulted together how to turn this accident to advantage; they henceforward frequented auction-rooms, and ransacked brokers' shops, to make mutual discoveries of original pictures, which might be had for a song. Mr. Holcroft, in this manner, laid out between four and five hundred pounds, by which he expected to clear at least double the sum.

In this expectation he was once more wretchedly disappointed. Not that the pictures were in themselves bad; they were many of them excellent, and in general by the masters to whom they were attributed; but they were not the finest specimens of those masters, and with respect to second-rate pictures, it requires either an acquaintance with the particular master who happens to be in vogue for the time, or regular connections with other picture-dealers, to secure the purchaser against loss. The pictures which Mr. Holcroft sent over to England were fifty-seven in number. They were entrusted to the care of Mr. Godwin. He prevailed on some professional friends to go and look at them, who thought they would hardly sell for the amount of the custom-house duties, which were a hundred and fifty pounds. A few of them were however brought away, and left in the care of Mr. Opie. The following friendly letter to Mr. Holcroft, was written on this subject:—

"December 5, 1792.

"I am quite ashamed that your letter should have remained so long unnoticed; but being at Norwich when it arrived, I thought it better to wait till I came to town, and had seen the pictures mentioned in it, that I might, at the same time I answered it, give you some account of them.

"The pictures I found, through the care of Mr. Gillies, safely lodged in my house on my return to town, which was only three days ago. With the sketch by Rubens I am quite charmed: it is really a most exquisite thing. The portrait is a good one; but is not the likeness of Lord Strafford, nor painted by Vandyke. The other two are not at first view so much to my taste, nor am I coninced they were painted by the master to whom you attribute them; but I cannot speak decisively till I have examined them with more attention. Care shall be taken of all; but the Rubens have mounted into my painting room, as it contains a great deal worth studying.

"You will do great injustice to the sentiments of esteem and friendship, which both Mrs. Opie and myself feel for you, if you do not rest assured that to hear of your health and welfare will at all times give us pleasure; and we have only to beg that in your next, you will make no other use of your bridle, than to lay its reins on the neck of your affection, in the utmost confidence that all that comes from you will be received with a most hearty welcome.

"I am, with the highest esteem,

"Yours most sincerely,

"J. OPIE."

These pictures were all of them afterwards redeemed from the custom-house; and with those which Mr. Holcroft had bought in at his first sale, and other purchases he made on the continent, sold for near 700*l*.

While at Hamburg, Mr. Holcroft met with one of those alarming accidents, of which, in the course of his life, a more than usual number fell to his share. He had been recommended to bathe his feet in hot water, and mix a certain quantity of aquafortis in the bath. As he was pouring the aquafortis into the tub, the steam of the water caused the bottle, which was of very thin glass, to burst; the aquafortis flew up to his face, burned his wrists to the bone; but luckily his spectacles saved his eyes. The state he was in was dreadful, yet not a single complaint escaped him. "Thank God," he exclaimed to his terrified wife, who just before the accident had wished to pour the aquafortis in, but was prevented from doing so, "you and the child (whom she held in her arms) are safe!" His daughters, who were undressing in the next room, alarmed by the shrieks of Mrs. Holcroft, rushed into the apartment, which was filled with steam; and the distraction of the youngest at seeing the condition her father was in, deprived her of all presence of mind. "For Heaven's sake, Fanny, said her father, "calm yourself; and do you, Sophy, listen to what I say. Let Dr. Maclean be immediately fetched: he lives in such a street. Your violent grief, my dear girls, instead of good, does harm. Be collected, and like rational beings." It was more than two hours before he attended by his friend, Dr. Maclean. Till he arrived, Mr. Holcroft supposed himself deprived of sight; and the joy which the assurance that he was not blind excited may be easily imagined. During a long and painful confinement, he was perfectly cheerful, and his mind always employed and active.

Two years before this accident, Mr. Holcroft was so dangerously ill as to be given over by his physicians: and at that time his fortitude and presence of mind saved his life. One night the spasms to which he was subject, were so violent, that he felt, if they continued, he could not live. Dr. Pitcairne had advised him to take a very small quantity of laudanum, beginning with five drops, which he might increase to fifteen or twenty at the utmost, should the pain become worse. Finding the pain grow more and more violent, he desired his amanuensis, who attended him, to give him fifteen then twenty, drops at a time. This he took to the amount of thirty in the course of the night. Mr. Ralph expostulated, and said he was afraid to give them; but Mr. Holcroft insisted — "If the pains continue," said he, "it is impossible I should live, and I must die." This bold but dangerous experiment succeeded.

Mr. Holcroft's stay at Hamburg lasted above a year. He had some difficulty in procuring a passport to Paris from the French minister at the Hague (as we were then at war with France), but on a second application he succeeded. He had also met with some impediment in obtaining one from Mr. Frere, before he went abroad. While he was at Hamburg, a paragraph appeared in one of our morning papers, directly charging him with being a spy for the French government. To this paragraph he condescended to make a public answer.

Mr. Holcroft remained above two years at Paris. While he seems to have been chiefly occupied in collecting materials for the large work on the manners, &c. of this capital, which he published after his return, in 1804. Of this work ("Travels into France, &c.") it is only just to say, that it is one of the most interesting and instructive books of travels in the language. Its fault perhaps is that it bears too hard on the foibles of the French, which Mr. Holcroft seems to have regarded too much with the eye of an Englishman. Their own self-sufficiency, it is true, is enough to provoke and justify considerable severity of criticism. W respect to the question itself of the difference between the two nations, all that can be said upon it, I think, amounts only to this,—that the one has too much gravity, and the other too much levity. Our gravity frequently degenerates into phlegm, coldness, reserve, pride, obstinacy, and sullenness; as their constitutional levity is productive of frivolity, pertness, unmeaning loquacity, self-conceit, fickleness, and indifference to good or evil. The feelings of the French are more quick and lively; those of the English more deep and permanent: again, their apprehensions have more facility and nicety of observation; our own countrymen have shown greater strength and comprehensiveness of mind. France has, I am persuaded, produced more clever men than England; but that she has produced more great men than England, cannot be pretended. The mind of a Frenchman is, in general, more easily moved, and by slighter causes; an Englishman's feelings are, for the very reason that they require a greater momentum to bring them out, more steady and more strong. I do not here inquire into the superiority of the French or English character. I only state what I conceive to be the difference with a view to those among the French, who, setting up an exclusive claim to certain qualities, will not allow others the superiority in things which are totally distinct, and who are ready to grasp all excellence, however incompatible, to themselves. Those who wish to be furnished with facts illustrative of the peculiar manners and character of the French, will find ample materials for this purpose, accompanied with refined and discriminating reflections, in the "Travels" of our author.

I shall insert only two examples, which may show the pointed felicity with which Mr. Holcroft has selected his traits of national character. "My wife," says Mr. Holcroft, "was one day buying some fish; and while she was undetermined, the girl said to her,—'Prenez cela, car votre mari est un brave homme.' My wife replied,—'Oui, cela se peut bien; mais comment savez-vous qu'il est un brave homme?' 'C'est égal,' answered the girl, 'cela fait plaisir à entendre.' This girl's maxim is sound morality wherever I have been in France." The difference between words and things is certainly less marked in France than in England: how far this is an advantage or a disadvantage, I do not, for my own part, pretend to decide.

The other story is highly honourable to, as well as characteristic of, the French. Their humanity, whatever else we may costs them less than it does the English.

“A poor musician, who usually brought a small piano afternoon to the Champs Elysées, and played, that those pleased might reward him by a trifle, having played in evening, was sorrowfully retiring home. He was seen by (a famous actor), remarked, and questioned. The poor success of the wandering musician moved the pity of who desired the instrument might again be put down; and aside, he said he would return instantly. His wife and passed on, and he brought them back. It was nearly dark, his friend, sat down to the pianoforte, and accompanied, who began to sing, to the astonishment of number soon assembled. The men had drawn their hats over their eyes. Madame Elleviou put down her veil, and went round to the pleasingness of her manner, the little thankful crowd dropt to all who gave, the whiteness of her hand, and ordinary music they heard, rendered the audience so lively she made several tours, and none ineffectually. Elleviou could not long remain unknown; and finding themselves noticed, Madame Elleviou gave all, and it was supposed more than had collected from the crowd, to the poor musician amounted to thirty shillings; and among the pence and there were crown pieces, which no doubt were given by actors. The scene, as the audience dispersed, is now to be described. The unexpected relief, afforded to the poor man was departing so disconsolate, was great indeed: but forgotten in the charming behaviour of those who relieved their almost divine music, and in the strangeness of the scene. The surrounding people were scarcely less moved; so that from a man in such high public estimation, excited admiration; and the tears of gratitude shed by the music sympathising drops from many of the spectators. This led to two new musical pieces, which were both successful.

This was certainly an action of which an Englishman capable, but to which every Englishman will give his tribute of applause. When people dispute and cavil at another's actions, it is only because there is something absurd on both sides.

The "Travels through France, &c.," were published by Phillips, and Mr. Holcroft received 1500*l.* for the copyright.

After Mr. Holcroft's return from the continent, in the summer of 1803, almost the first undertaking in which he embarked was the establishment of a printing-house, in connection with his mother-in-law, Mercier. Mr. Holcroft found unexpected difficulties in this business, owing to the want of sufficient capital to carry on. Meeting also with many heavy losses in publications which he undertook to print on his own account, he found himself under the necessity, in order to satisfy the pressing demands of his creditors, to dispose of the printing-office, having previously obtained his partner's consent to do so.

Mr. Holcroft brought out six dramatic pieces while he was abroad, or after his return to England: "Deaf and Dumb," "The Scapes," "Hear both Sides," "A Tale of Mystery," "The Lady of the Rock," and lastly, "The Vindictive Man." All of them, except the last, were successful.

Those which became the greatest favourites with the public, were, "Deaf and Dumb," and the "Tale of Mystery," a melodrama. Both of these are certainly exquisite in their kind, but of the first it is not too much to say, that it is one of the most beautiful and affecting stories that ever was exhibited on any stage. It is taken from the French play of M. Bouilly, which was itself founded on an incident in the life of the famous Abbé de l'Epée, instructor of the deaf and dumb.

Julio, the heir of the lord of Harancour, who is born deaf and dumb, is left an orphan when he is only eight years old; and the helplessness of his situation suggesting the possibility of getting rid of him, he is taken from Toulouse to Paris by his guardian and paternal uncle, assisted by a servant in the family, and there lost in the streets at night. Dupré, the accomplice of his uncle Darlemont, swears to his death; and at their return home, Darlemont is invested with the estates and honours of the house of Harancour. Meantime, poor Julio is found in the streets of Paris in a coarse dress, which does not denote him to be anything but a beggar; and it being discovered that he is deaf and dumb, he is taken to the asylum of the Abbé de l'Epée for children who are born with this defect. The melancholy observed in his countenance and manner, the delicacy of his complexion, and other circumstances, soon lead to a suspicion that he is the child of rich parents, and has been purposely lost by some person who wished to usurp his rights. He is taught the use of artificial signs, and learns to read and write. One day, being with De l'Epée, when a judge is passing by dressed in his full robes, Julio is violently agitated, and makes signs to his instructor that his father used to be dressed in this manner. Another time, passing through the Barrière d'Enfer, the recollection suddenly struck him that this was the very gate through which he entered Paris. This produced a conviction in the mind of l'Epée that he came from some city in the south of France, of which in all likelihood his father had been chief magistrate. Yet how to proceed in his behalf? The youth had never heard his father's name, he did not know his family, or the place of his birth. After some ineffectual researches, De l'Epée resolves at last to take his pupil with him, and traverse in person and on foot the whole of the south of France. They embrace each other, invoke the protection of Heaven, and set forward. After a journey, long, fatiguing, hopeless, they at length arrive at the gates of Toulouse. Julio knows the place, seizes his benefactor's hand, and uttering wild cries of joy, leads him quickly, here and there, through various quarters of the city. At last they come to the square in which the palace of Harancour stood; he stops, points to the mansion, shrieks, and falls senseless into the arms of l'Epée. This is the foundation of the story, the rest may be easily divined by the reader. "The Vindictive Man" was the last, and certainly not the best, of Mr Holcroft's dramatic productions. It was condemned at Drury Lane. From the state of his circumstances at the time, this failure was felt as a severe blow by the author. With what feelings he bore it, may be learned from a short but beautiful dedication of the play to Miss Holcroft.

"To my daughter Fanny.

"To you, my dear, I inscribe this comedy, because you approved nay, was partial enough to admire the scenes, progressively as they were written, and the play, when it became a whole. I inscribe it to you, because you have dedicated your talents, by your literary efforts, to the cause of morality, and have need of that patient resignation to which every writer is doomed. I inscribe it to you and in this sense to my whole family, with sympathetic tenderness as a solitary testimony of true and ardent affection : as such, I am well persuaded you will all receive it, though it has been publicly condemned. You will remember the giver ; and the gift, though barren, will be welcome."

Besides the plays which have been enumerated, Mr. Holcroft, after his return to England, published "The Theatrical Recorder," in two volumes, a small volume of poems, called "Tales in Verse," and the novel of "Brian Perdue."

Mr. Holcroft, at the time of the failure of his last play, had several dramatic as well as other manuscripts in hand, which, had he been allowed to finish them, would have easily relieved him from his temporary embarrassments. He had, however, a young and increasing family to maintain ; and the ill health with which he had long struggled now increased fast upon him, and rendered all his efforts vain.

Mr. Holcroft had, for nearly a year, been so much troubled with an asthma, as to render walking difficult to him. He was not, however, confined to his house till about half a year before his death. His disorder was violent spasms, accompanied with spitting of blood, and an enlargement of the heart, occasioned, as was supposed, by continual anxiety. It was during the two last months of his illness, when he could no longer rise from his bed, and when every effort to speak was almost convulsive, that he dictated the account of his own life, which has been inserted in the beginning of these volumes. Let it remain a proof of the energy of his character, and of that superiority of the mind over the body which was one of his strongest sentiments. Through the whole time he discovered a fortitude in suffering which has rarely been equalled ; nor did he till the very last relinquish the hopes of recovering. If any thing could exceed the patient courage with which he passed through this trying scene, it was the affectionate, unwearied assiduity with which Mrs. Holcroft attended him, night and day, through the whole. For the last six weeks, she scarcely once quitted his bedside for a quarter of an hour together. The task was one to which duty and affection were alone equal. In any other circumstances, her strength would have failed under such exertions : but Mr. Holcroft was not satisfied unless she was with him, and that consideration prevailed over every other. Colonel Harwood; his son-in-law, was with him from the Sunday evening before he died; on which day his physicians, Dr. Buchan and Dr. Hooper, had given him over. Many of the following particulars are taken from Colonel Harwood's account.

There was not the shortest interval in which he was not in complete possession of himself. The only slight indication to the contrary was that he once said to the Colonel, "I have great difficulty sometimes in rousing my mind; therefore, if at any time I stop in speaking to you, do you remember my last word, and join it to the next that I shall afterwards say to you." This, however, rather implied his strong efforts to preserve his intellects, than the failure of them. His stopping at any time in the midst of a sentence appeared to be always owing to the difficulty of articulation, rather than the loss of memory. When he was so far gone that it was difficult to understand him, he desired those who were with him to repeat his words, that he might be sure they were heard, and then nodded assent.

On Sunday he expressed a wish to see Mr. Godwin, but when he came, his feelings were overpowered. He could not converse, and only pressed his hand to his bosom, and said, "My dear, dear friend!" On Monday he again wished to see Godwin, and all his friends that could be sent to: but he had not strength sufficient to hold a conversation: he could only take an affectionate leave, and then, he said, he had nothing more to do in this world. He afterwards frequently spoke, or moved his lips, as taking a most affectionate leave. A little before he died he called for wine, and refused it from every hand that held it to him, till his eldest daughter took it into hers; he then bowed his head to her, and drank it; thus, in some way or other, showing signs of regard to all, till his last moments approached. Hearing a noise of children on the stairs, he said to his wife, "Are those your children, Louisa?" as if he was already disengaged from human ties. On Thursday night, about half-past eleven, he seemed in great pain, and said to Mrs. Holcroft, "How tedious! my affections are strong." It was thought, from this, that it would be a relief to his feelings that they should retire: they all went into the next room, Colonel Harwood still keeping his eye upon him; but seeing his struggles increase, and being desirous of sparing his wife and daughter a sight they could not have borne, he returned into the bed-room, and gradually shut and fastened the doors; which Mr. Holcroft observing, showed evident signs of satisfaction. And seeming even easier, he smiled, and fixing his eyes on his friend, took them no more from him till they were closed for ever.—Thus died a great and good man, who showed in the last and most trying scene of all the same firmness of mind and warmth of affection which had distinguished him through life.

Mr. Holcroft died on Thursday, the 23rd of March, 1809, at the age of 63.

The following is the report which Dr. P. A. Buchan and Mr. A. Carlisle favoured Colonel Harwood with, who also attended the examination.

Statement of the Anatomical Inspection of Mr. Thomas Holcroft, aged 63.

“ London, March 24th, 1809.

“ The examination took place twenty-four hours after decease. The body was considerably emaciated, and slightly anasarctous throughout. An extensive cicatrix at the upper part of the sternum, and at the junction of the neck with the breast, indicated one long-continued chronic abscesses. The cavity of the abdomen contained about a pint of dropsical water. The stomach, intestines, mesenteric glands, kidneys, and bladder, were free from diseased structure. The liver was about twice the natural bulk, hard, and tuberculated on its surfaces. The peritoneal covering of this viscous substance was marked by numerous opaque spots, where the membrane was drawn into folds, and this appearance seemed to characterise a series of inflammations. The interior texture of the liver was tuberculated. The gall-bladder was much distended. The outer surface of the spleen had much of the appearance displayed by the liver. The cavities of the thorax contained about two quarts of dropsical water. The lungs were soft, and their air-vessels free. The heart was large, and bore the relaxed character which often occurs after a long-continued laborious circulation. The coronary arteries had begun to ossify. The arch of the aorta was dilated, approaching to aneurism, and the texture of its coats had become hard and inelastic. The descending aorta and the primary iliac arteries had become completely ossified in several parts, and were unduly dilated. From the facts here adduced, it may be considered that the diseased structure of the liver, and of the heart and its principal arteries, led to the dropsy of the chest, which might be the immediate cause of death, although in a frame so disorganised, life could not have been much longer protracted. Whether the disease of the liver preceded that of the heart and its vessels, or the contrary, and whether they were distinct diseases, and which of these led most decidedly to the fatal event, are subjects for uncertain speculation."

LETTERS TO AND FROM THE AUTHOR.

LETTER I.

To a Friend. 1799.

, and many other of my friends, were informed of my s for quitting my native country, and residing some few abroad; till more peaceable times should again render that y to me what it once was,—admirable for its general in-, manners, and morality, and undisturbed by the suspicions persecutions with which other countries were, and too often continue to be, afflicted. Nothing but the strange terror had seized the public mind could have engendered that of individual rancour so foreign to the English character, suddenly spread through the nation; and nothing but the of mind, under such an impulse, could have made me sus-as one of the heads of the abominable Hydra, to extirpate every Englishman was summoned. The fear was itself ris-is: but, in their consequences, such fears have been fatal to a worthy man.

cannot recollect these things unmoved; neither can I hear s false reports of my being obliged to quit England, and of t being suffered to return, without wishing that those who nem credit may be undeceived. My departure from England luntary; as is my absence. I cannot live in danger from hich I have not violated, or power with which I do not con-
I carefully shun the acrimony of political dispute, and the in which it is indulged. To the utmost of the little ability
, it is my desire to inform, with the hopes of benefiting, nd; and this end cannot be attained by making them angry.
on, heart, and principle, I am, or would become, the friend of man. The only enemy I encounter is error ; and that weapon but words : my constant theme has been, let it be not whipped.

“ The letters I mean to address to you are intended public ; and of these facts I wish the public to be informed. You must not, therefore, be surprised that I tell them in this place. Whatever fable may invent, or credit give, I pledge my veracity to the world, that what I have said is literally true : and may the world treat my memoir that ignominy which a falsehood so solemn and gratuitous deserve, if I prevaricate !

“ Avoiding the pursuit of this painful subject, the busy mind recurs to another, equally ungrateful : I did not quit the friends, in whose intercourse I found so much benefit, and so much delight, but with the bitterness of regret. I could not be apathetic, and see the few effects I had collected become the prey of brokers and dealers ; and chiefly my library, on which much of my money and time had been bestowed, squandered in twenty and more books in a lot ; several of them individually greater worth than the price paid for the whole. It seemed a dissolution of my social life ; and something like the entrance into a wild and savage state. What multitudes of such thoughts my afflicted heart suffer without giving them utterance ! but have communicated and increased affliction.

“ I wish not to dwell on these dark parts of the picture which quits the country of his fathers without a sigh ? Yet, who would go forward to lands unexplored without hopes of strange and unexpected pleasures ? It is a season full of apprehensions and flutterings of the heart, and hopes and fears too numerous to be defined. At least it is such to those to whom travelling is become a habit.

“ Some people have asked, why are books of travel so often read ? It is because they are so often entertaining. When they differ but little from our own, seldom fail to excite surprise, our laughter, or our contempt. Without crossing the seas, a man who has the faculty of noticing the remarkable, the whimsical, and the absurd, in his daily walks at home, never fails to entertain, if he think proper to narrate and to comment. The traveller who wants this faculty of observation, journeys for no purpose, and is heard with little pleasure. He sometimes endeavours to falsify the true reports of his predecessors ; and to offer the dulness of his discernment as a proof of his impartiality Thus much by way of introduction."

LETTER II.

"LET us begin our journey, and whet your imagination to fill up the narrative.

"We were sufficient in number to occupy a small cabin ; and various reasons determined us to sail down the river, instead of posting by land to Yarmouth. Wind and weather out of the question, he that depends on the word of a captain, for the day that his vessel will be ready to sail, will be deceived ninety times in a hundred ; a week of additional latitude is often too little. Not thoroughly aware of this, we left the polite parish of Marylebone, and removed to the purlieus of London Bridge. How many thanks are due to our worthy and liberal friend G., for the many invitations he gave us to his table, and the pleasant urbanity with which we were there treated. But these, you well know, are not the only acts of kindness for which we are indebted to this free-hearted, worthy man.

"About two days before we went on board, a sudden difficulty seemed to start. We were told we should be stopped at Gravesend, if we had not a passport. This seemed incredible ; we inquired, and some affirmed, and others denied, the necessity of such a document. Could an Englishman want a passport, to go wherever his business or his pleasure might invite him, within the British domains, or to a neutral state ? By many the idea was scouted, and as it proved, justly. Yet others were so positive in affirming the reverse, that I thought it prudent, for full security, to go to Gravesend, and inquire.

"It happened to be at the hour when the tide served, and the common passage-boats were ready to sail ; and, as this was a cheap, an expeditious, and to me a novel conveyance, it was in every sense acceptable. Those who have made the experiment, know with what solicitations they have been invited to step on board first one boat and then another. On this occasion, it happened that the Queen Charlotte, and the Prince of Wales, were rivals ; but, as I was first harangued by the orator of the Charlotte, and had no other preponderating motive, the right seemed to be in her; and I was escorted, with great eagerness and civility, to my seat.

"I had heard so much of Gravesend passengers, and the peculiar rhetoric in which they indulge, that I thought it probable they would detect something ridiculous in the cut of my coat, the colour of my hair, or some other feature or appurtenance about me. I was not deceived. The shortsightedness that obliges me to wear spectacles, has often subjected me to the derision of the working community, who never suspect there can be a rational motive for walking the streets with what they generally regard as a badge of supreme folly. I had not taken my place five seconds, before I saw the leer and the wink go round. The weather being fine, every body was on deck; and the assumed gravity of my look at first checked risibility. But the pause was short. An impudent fellow opposite to me, looking in my face, said, 'The next time I go to court, I will get a saddle for my nose, because I see it is all the go.' 'You had better get a handle to your hat,' said the man at the helm, whose invitation to come on board I had followed; and who, therefore, I suppose, thought proper to be my champion. My assailant knew his man, and, without noticing this retort, continued,—'I'll ask my granny to leave me her bar-naeles. Pray, sir, how many candles may you see in the dark, when only one is lighted?' 'How many fools did you meet when you last dipt your pate in a pail of water? Who gave you that coarse net-work to cover your face? Why did not you ask your wife to wash it before you came out?' [The man was scarred with pock-marks, and the river tar continued] 'You're a pretty fellow to hoist the slang-flag! Where did you learn gull-shooting?—you are an apt scholar! You could eat a giblet-pie before you could spell goose .' Enough of these vulgar but merry kind of combats. Would that the well-bred duellist were as harmless!

"I believe it was here I first remarked one of the many superstitious habits of seamen, — that of whistling for a wind. I find it is common to them all, from the captain to the cabin-boy. The day was more calm than either the passengers or the boatmen wished; and, to beguile the time, a man sang the beautiful ballad of 'Black-Eyed Susan.' Having ended, another told us a tragical tale, which the song, no doubt, had brought to memory.

"The mate of a ship had a sweetheart, who came on board the evening he was to sail. She was a pretty girl, and deeply af-her love was strong, or rather violent. Having drawn him to tell him, if they parted, she was certain they should meet again, and that she had not the power to leave the ship, he remonstrated on the impossibility of her stay; but she listened to nothing but her passion, fears, and forebodings. At last, intreated, went on her knees, and, if he would but consent, she would hide herself in the fore-castle, till the ship was under weigh. The mate, who could not comply, at length refused, and left her in anger, while she threatened her own death. He went below, and, not seeing her when he returned, he concluded she was gone. Alas! the poor agitated and fragile creature had thrown herself overboard. She had done so; and the mate, immediately afterward, perceiving that in which she came was waiting, began to inquire; but not knowing what had become of her. He recollected her proposition to herself, and went in search, certain, as he supposed, she had made the attempt. She was nowhere to be found: his alarm increased; his cheeks became pale. One man said, 'he had heard her fall into the water, and to be sure it must be she. Who else could it be? she might have been thrown overboard?' Suspicious of the pale and pallid hue and wild terror of the poor mate gave them; he was taken into custody, tried for the supposed murder, great danger of suffering death; so strong did the circumstance against him appear to be in the opinion of his judges. One witness, however, was very clear in his testimony, that he saw the mate under the hatches, and leave the deceased on the deck; that he saw him return; and that it was during this interval of time that the mate must have happened, for that he and others had accused the mate in his search to find her. Thus the positive and irrefragable evidence of this witness, saved his shipmate from an ignominious death.

The life of a man, in a court of law, depends upon a breath. For it, you who sit in judgment on the lives of your fellow creatures!

Another told us how his cabin-boy (he was himself a sea-man) jumped overboard in a rough sea, to recover a mop, which he had accidentally let fall. He succeeded, but it was at the cost of his life. 'I asked him,' said the captain, 'how he came to do such a thing? and the little hell-spawn told me, "he was told he should give him the cat, if the mop had been lost." I'll give it you to some tune, lubber, said I, if you do such a thing again.'—So much for a captain's humanity. This is no bad instance of the general despotism exercised on board of ships.

"Fine writing will object to the coarseness of phraseology in this letter, and, under other circumstances, I would not give fine writing such cause of complaint; but, were it changed in this place, we should no longer be in company with sea-captains and passengers from Billingsgate in a Gravesend boat."

LETTER III.

"We parted during a calm, in my last; but remember we are not yet at Gravesend. In wit, vulgar or refined, puns are more frequent agents than wits generally suppose. Hearing a child cry in a woman's arms, a sailor exclaimed, 'So! We have a squall; we shall soon have a breeze.' 'Yes,' replied a second; 'I hope another hand will be put to the bellows.'

"It so happened that the punster was a prophet. The sail swelled, and the steersman told us 'we could not have a better wind if we had bought one.' To which another added, 'he wishes he could find the way to the weather office.'

"I doubt if there be a nation existing, more skilful and alert on the water than the English. The Thames, in particular, has vessels so numerous, and of such various kinds, riding and traversing its waves in such endless directions, that the unaccustomed eye is confused in its attempts to distinguish and individualise the moving multitude. Ships, snows, brigs, sloops, cutters, barges, lighters, boats, vessels of every form and size, and from all regions of the earth! My heart beat while I watched the dexterity with which they mutually shunned the shocks, that, at every returning moment, threatened each other with oversetting. Of this we were once in danger. The steersman of a heavy barge, had his attention called away, perhaps not three seconds, from his duty; and it was with the utmost exertion and presence of mind that the active fellows on board the Charlotte kept her from running foul of the barge. The danger past, they were enraged, and began to rate the barge-man, who, angry with, and ashamed of, himself, bade them, in a surly tone, 'mind their own business.' 'You don't mind yours,' aptly retorted one of them; 'I'll be hanged if you are he that set the Thames on fire.'

"I was not a little amused by an itinerant bookseller, one of the passengers, who opened his pocket, and spread his wares upon leek ; and, to astonish and invite customers, among other things, exhibited a small quarto, on botany, with coloured plates, which, he told us, was for a surprising learned gentleman at West Thurrock. (Apropos of Thurrock. All book-men are addicted to tymology. Pray was this the rock of the gothic god, Thor?) Among his literary treasures was a sixpenny description of the passage by water, from London to Gravesend, by the erudite bibliopole Pocock, of the latter place, from which, if you have the patience to read it, you may discover how many reaches, or windings, are in this tract. Pillaging this boatman's history, and venturing to the shore, our sagacious tradesman told us, 'all those uses were built in one day's time.' The prevaricating knave might have given a different emphasis, and have said, 'in one day's time.' But wit was always a shuffling fellow, and seldom a friend to truth. The hawker's jocularity, from the same source, was next exerted on a church, of which we had a prospect, which, he said, was as light by night as it was by day ! Of the truth of which quaint pun the inventor had no doubt. Yet the unvarying force of gravitation is not perhaps absolutely certain. But I am now getting out of my depth, and will therefore hasten on shore to Gravesend. In despite of the noble stream that washes the banks, this said Gravesend is a dirty, disagreeable place, and for pitiful extortion unrivalled. If you have but little money in your purse, or if you feel indignation or sorrow at beholding man in the daily practice of petty theft, till the confirmed habit makes him believe thieving to be justice, and necessary to his happiness, arrange your affairs, so as to make but a short stay at Gravesend. It was my good fortune to remain there only one night. My journey was unnecessary ; no pass was required : but of this I was ignorant. The expense and trouble were trifling, the characters and scene of action new, and the pain of uncertainty was relieved. And now thank your benignant stars that you have escaped from a Gravesend boat, and have only paid so trifling a tax on good sense and good manners. The potentate of the North, at whose breath all things shake, having honoured a yacht by his presence, issued an edict, commanding that it should no longer remain a paltry yacht, but become a glorious frigate. Peter was not so great as Paul, for Peter could only change a brown loaf into Banbury mutton."

LETTER IV.

“AND now comes the day of departure : and now farewell for a time to London, that hive of souls ; itself the soul of Britain, the seat of action, the city of great events ! Farewell to many pleasures, and to many pains ! to friends in whom the heart delighted ! to foes that persecuted they knew not why ! we go in search of better days.

“ Before we embark, suffer me to make an observation, and tell a story. Fortune is a capricious jade ; she flies from those who pursue ; and pursues those who shun her. The remark is old ; but not, I believe, the tale to which it leads.

“ In the town of Halberstadt, not long ago, there lived a tanner, remarkable for having been made enormously rich against his will. During the seven years’ war, the French, being at this place, had collected all the cattle in the environs, the skins of which they had to sell. The tanners of Halberstadt had but little power to buy, one alone excepted. To him the French applied ; but, not understanding speculation after a certain quantity, he absolutely refused any more. Conquerors are not to be trifled with ; and finding that their persuasions, which indeed were numberless, could not prevail, they resorted to the argumentum baculinum, and the tanner was at last beat into compliance. It was, however, under the condition that the other tanners would, at a fair price, lend him their tan-pits ; and this the argumentative French very readily undertook. The tanners were summoned, refused, and the rhetoric of the bastinado was again employed. It was resistless ; the tanners let out their tan-pits. The tanner, who bought the hides at one-sixth of their value, parted with the dollars he had been so desirous to retain ; and, in a few years afterward, became the wealthiest tanner in Germany.

“ I will give you another example of the caprice of this said Madam Fortune.

“ In Germany there are lotteries of various construction. Of one of these the law is, that he who draws a first prize, a second, and a third, shall the fourth time be one of the five that are to draw for the capital lot of I know not how many thousand dollars. A cooper, who loved to tap the barrels he hooped, bought a ticket, which came up a prize once, twice, and thrice ; but the foolish was thirsty ; and being offered drink for the present, and to buy more for a fortnight to come, he could not resist the temptation, and sold his ticket, which was a fourth time the forlumber. He comforted himself with his can ; and made a venture, with exactly the same good and ill success. To man this would have been horribly vexatious ; but the cooper let it pass ; and when the next lottery came, made purchase. The third time it had arrived at the third winning, and he was again on the point of parting with his

By something of persuasion, and something of force, the fellow was prevented. ‘ Fortune,’ said his friends, or perhaps wife, though this is the kind of husband a wife knows how to manage, ‘ Fortune absolutely persecutes you to accept of ours ; why do you so perversely cast them from you ? ’ He the sot heard reason ; and the doctrine of chances proved dangerous it is to lay the long odds ; for the cooper’s ticket gained the great prize.

Thus our fortune is flying ; and we are now in pursuit. The will show how perverse a jade she is, and how determined she overtaken.

On the 1st of July, 1799, we went on board the Kennet, Captain Thomson. All was confusion, all hurry. Barges, loaded with odious bales, lay beside her ; a dozen men were straining every nerve to raise them over her side, and stow them between her and the shore. It excited attention and surprise to see these cumbrous barges edged with such contrivance as scarcely to leave a vacancy. Nothing that suppleness of limb shows, sinews and muscular strength would effect, was in continual exertion. The vessel was to enter the river the next tide ; which seemed incompatible with our being so long detained.

With what additional wonder do I recollect scenes like these in a maritime country, having compared them with the inattention and idleness I have witnessed. Here every man was active and intelligent, and one even supremely above the rest. Indeed it was pro-

He was the mate ; he directed the whole ; his eye was everywhere ; and his arm seemed to work miracles. He was full of vigour ; and when the ponderous load seemed to defy their strength, he came, applied his giant force, and, at the first effort, began to move. His agility was no less surprising, and irreconcilable to such bulk ; for his wrist would doubly measure that of an ordinary man. His understanding was equal to his bodily power; he instantly saw what was wrong, and the way in which it was to be rectified. Give but his faculties another circle of action, and an epic poet might have made this man his hero; yet he was but the mate of a ship, subject to a captain who, though no fool, was far indeed from his equal; and when I asked him if he did not mean to be a captain himself, answered with a sigh — ‘I wish, sir, I may ever have so much good fortune.’

“In what a traverse and frequently ludicrous manner does accident arrange the place and office of man, and the affairs of this poor world!

“The mate’s name was Baird; and he and his commander were both Scotchmen. In the invoice, he was written captain, and the captain supercargo; a falsehood to which the infamous practice of pressing has given birth; a mate, like a foremast man, being liable to be pressed.

“When I came on board, and saw the work that was still to do, I concluded it was impossible it should be accomplished. The mate himself doubted, but hoped, and worked like legion. Yes; we were at Gravesend the next day, where we were examined at the Alien Office; and on the evening of the 3rd, anchored at the Nore.

“The ocean was before us; the evening was calm; the expanse vast; the shores of Essex and of Kent were to the right and left; and the fleet with which we were to sail, with our convoy, and the admiral’s ship that guards the Nore, were all in view. The silence that reigned was suddenly interrupted by the eight o’clock bell, that rang from vessel to vessel; and, much more agreeably, by the admiral’s military band. We were at a proper distance; and the music came so softened to our ears that it was delightful.

“The captain went on board our convoy, received his sailing instructions, and the next morning the fleet, about thirty in number, was under weigh.

“Owing to the closeness with which the ship was stowed, the decks were so belumbered, that it required the cat-like activity of a sailor to pass, without a fall, to the forecastle. I supposed they were so to continue. How much was I mistaken! No sooner was the business of setting the sails performed, than the active Baird began a clearance. All hands were at work; the hatches opened; room for stowage still was to be found; cables were coiled;

and, in less than half an hour, no signs of disorder or incumbrance were to be seen. In some things, how full of caution is a sailor! How active is he, and how orderly on the approach of storm or battle. What contradictions are there in his habits! The least appearance of defect in his shrouds, braces, or rigging, must be repaired: his decks must be daily washed; to every thing that regards the safety of the ship, the strictest attention must be paid. He must not sleep more than four hours at a time, and never soundly; the least alarm must bring him upon deck. His eye must alternately be upon the watch; his apprehension of danger must never cease. Meanwhile, his own convenience is utterly neglected. Being at sea, he puts on any dirty or ragged jacket, sleeps upon boards or ropes, and feeds on the coarsest fare. Our cook was half covered with grease and tar; his hands were uncommonly large, and chapped; and he washed his dishes with a cable's end. It often happens that the sailor's beef is half putrid, his butter and cheese the same, his biscuits swarming with maggots, and his water stinking. To this he is sometimes by necessity reduced; and the landsman is astonished at the habits which such hard necessities have taught. But a voyage to Hamburg is seldom of so much severity, and the pampered passenger as seldom goes to sea unprovided.

LETTER V.

"OUR convoy was sluggish, and we were off the Norfolk coast on the 5th. We gave it some few parting sighs, remembering the relations and friends that were there, and who, perhaps, had they known the incident, would have brought down their telescopes, to have taken a last view. Was it affection or vanity that gave me this thought? Let it be permitted to hope the best.

He that makes a voyage and meets with no adventures, using the common phrase, must be greatly in or greatly out of luck; unless indeed we suppose him fast asleep, which, with the convenience of a close carriage is the way that most travellers see the world. A watchman, shut up in his box at midnight, without the aid of his candle and lantern, sees it as well. We were willing to keep awake, and were not in want of stimulants. I had been to sea before, more than once, yet had numberless things to remark, especially as I had never before sailed with a convoy. The Kennet was a good sailer ; but if we ran before our guardian, we were liable to have a ten-pounder sent, with a possibility of hitting us, as a warning order to keep astern. If we were too close, the peril was that of running foul of the ships under the Commodore's lee. If the weather fell hazy, this danger increased. If it was a calm we must no less carefully keep our distance. Should you have supposed that, being on the boundless ocean, you must always have sea room enough, the above hints may help to rectify your mistake.

On the 6th, we were off the Texel ; on the 7th saw Lord Duncan's fleet ; and on the 8th were still upon the Dutch coast. I repeat what the mariners and their charts told me, for I could not see land. The sailing under the protection of cannon balls, the look-out that was kept for the approach of an enemy, and the hostile fleets of Britain proudly riding on a threatened shore, inspired thoughts which — I will take another time to tell you what these thoughts were. We caught gurnels, a pretty but cruel warfare. The wretched animal was generally an hour gasping for the medium in which, till then, he had breathed, and dying with difficulty.

A more animating incident occurred. Perhaps you are ignorant that smugglers, if pursued, will sink their cargoes of gin, and leave a buoy, by the aid of which they are sometimes recovered. From one of these, as it was supposed, a keg was seen to come swimming among the fleet. The sight awakened two passions at once, — drunkenness and ambition. To what dangers do they expose the thirsty, the daring, and the rash ! The fleet was under sail, and the keg swam in a contrary direction. We perceived a consultation was held on board a ship but little distant. In a moment, one of the sailors began to strip. We watched his proceedings with surprise and apprehension ; we saw him plunge into the sea, and stem the waves with such eagerness, that it seemed impossible for his strength not to be presently exhausted. How impatiently did the eye pursue him, his head now hidden, and now seen dancing among the waves, till we could no longer catch a glimpse. It was a fearful distance. There was something so daring in the attempt, and so vigorous in the execution, that he became a kind of hero, in whose dubious fate every heart was interested.

“Meanwhile, the sailors, who first discovered the prize in question, lay to; that is, turned the ship so that the sails did not catch the wind; and hoisted out their boat. In this they went in search of the swimmer and the keg. We could not discover their proceedings; but we learned, after their return, that the sailor had overtaken and seized the object of his wishes; and they brought him and his prize once more on board of the ship to which he belonged, in triumph.

"A rash action, when successful, never fails to be admired. To people who live on shore, the remarks, language, and adventures of mariners are often amusing. The answers, however, which the latter return to passengers, are frequently surly, and expressive of contempt. Sailors, I assure you, are as pragmatic, and full of pedantry, in their way, as any Doctor the Universities can afford. Men are always surprised at, and diverted by each other's ignorance; forgetting their own.

"The seaman, however, has a feature common to us all; he is pleased with those who listen to his complaints. One of our men told me how long he had served on board a man-of-war, the sufferings he there endured, and painted the despotism of naval officers, in the anecdotes he related. A captain, who perhaps had read Culpepper, or some such erudite author, thought proper to physic his crew regularly once a month; and to take care the doses he prescribed were actually swallowed. This was not all; the men were sick afterwards, they were put in the bilboes, to convince them they were well; and one poor fellow, who was extremely weak, was flogged for not running fast enough up the boards.

"Another of these commanders having given a man three dozen lashes on the starboard of the vessel, ordered him two dozen more on the larboard; that, as he said, one side might not laugh at the other.

"The man cited many more incidents of a like kind; adding, that when on board a king's ship, he many a time wished himself dead. Observe, I can only be answerable for my own veracity; I faithfully repeat what I was told.

"I shall be equally accurate in what I am going to relate; though it is on a subject which some naturalists have treated as absurd. The captain and mate of the Kennet had both navigated the coast of Norway, the Northern Ocean, and the Atlantic; and I questioned them concerning the Kraken. They neither of them pretended to have seen this supposed stupendous monster of the waters : but they immediately expressed their firm conviction of its existence. I asked their reasons ; and they affirmed it had been twice seen within the last four years.

“ The first instance they cited was that of a captain coming from Archangel, or Greenland, through the Atlantic ; who was surprised at the appearance of rocks unknown to the chart of mariners, and immediately ordered out his boat, to have them examined ; meanwhile the Kraken, that is, the imaginary rocks, disappeared and he sailed over the place ; but forgot, during his astonishment, to sound.

“ Their second instance was more circumstantial. About two years and a half before the time at which they spoke, a Dane, sailing through the Firth of Forth, on the coast of Scotland, was so terrified at the appearance of rocks in such a place, that he lay to ; being for some time persuaded that he had lost his reckoning. and had arrived he knew not where. After consideration, he took courage, and sailed past them ; and when he arrived at Dundee, gave a relation of what he had seen. Finding himself at first disbelieved, he and his crew made oath of the fact, either at the Custom-house, or before a magistrate of Dundee. The narrators were both Scotchmen ; and affirmed they spoke of the attestation being thus made from their own knowledge. Persons, who shall deem it worth their trouble, may easily make an inquiry whether such attestation exists in Dundee.

“ My informants confirmed, unquestioned, the usual accounts, fabulous or not, that fishermen find plenty of fish on the back of the Kraken, as they do on sand banks, at a certain distance below the surface ; and that these fishermen hasten away, as soon as they perceive the Kraken beginning to rise, because, when it goes down, it occasions a dangerous whirlpool. These, you will recollect, are the old stories of Pontoppidan.

“ Finding this leviathan so familiar to their belief, I next inquired if they had heard, or knew any thing of the sea-snake, by some called the sea-worm ? To this question I received a still more direct answer. The mate, Mr. Baird, who certainly was not a liar by habit, whatever mistake or credulity might make him, assured me that, about the midway in a voyage to America, in the Atlantic, he had himself seen a fish, comparatively small in the body, of from forty to fifty fathoms in length ; and that he had excited great terror in the captain, who was well acquainted with those latitudes, lest it should sink the ship.

"They both related other stories concerning the appearance of this sea-worm, asserting, that it will rise out of the water as high as a common mainmast.

"Should you ask, do you repeat these things because you think them credible? I answer, no. But who can affirm he can mark out the boundaries of possibility? Some mariners treat these tales as absolutely false and ridiculous: others seriously affirm them to be true; and I think it a duty to collect evidence, and to remain on this question, as on many another, in a certain degree of scepticism.

"They spoke of another fact; which, supposing them to speak truth, deserves attention. The waves in the Western Ocean are sometimes so oily, from dead whales, as it is imagined, that they are not much disturbed by a brisk gale. The sailor's brisk gale, observe, by you and me would be called a high wind."

LETTER VI.

"REMEMBER I left you in a gale at sea, and a high wind on shore: but what would you think of a stiff breeze? I heard one described by a sailor, who swore that it shaved him; that he could not keep his hair safe on his head; and that it made the ship sneeze. His metaphors, and the composure with which he spoke of a tempest, that to a landsman would have been so full of terror, were amusing.

"Our voyage was performed by the aid of gentle gales; and we got in view of Heligoland on the morning of the 9th. Being now out of danger from an enemy, the ships were allowed to part company, and each make the best of her way. To people weary of the qualms and inconveniences of a sea voyage, and impatient to arrive at the place of their destination, with the latent hope of unknown pleasures from unknown sources, this was welcome news. The captain was teased with our questions; and we were much disappointed to find there was little hope we should yet see Hamburg within four and twenty hours.

"It was late in the day before we arrived at the red buoy, where usually the pilot comes on board. We now entered the Elbe, the navigation of which is both difficult and dangerous, if circumstances are unfavourable; and I could not but admire and most sincerely applaud the precautions taken for safety, and angur favourably of the industry and understanding I should find in Hamburg. These, however, are the labours of sea-faring men; and such are the dangers of the waters, that sailors, who, speaking of them as a class, are far from being the most intelligent, exert very sagacious means to guard against these dangers. The apparent width of the Elbe is great; but the bed of the navigable channel is comparatively small; buoys, therefore, have been placed and distinguished by colour and numbering, to mark out the course of the stream, which winds exceedingly.

"The eye of the traveller is always caught by those objects which differ greatly from such as he has been accustomed to see; and the appearance of our pilot was to us highly original. His figure was diminutive; yet so bundled up in jackets and breeches, that it was swelled out to a very respectable bulk. His breeches, far from being small clothes, were large and loose, and had pockets, or rather paunches, at the sides, in which he put his pipe, his tobacco, his bread and cheese, and other necessities. I suppose he wore half a dozen pairs; for he unbuttoned three, with great unconcern, before us all, to come at a fourth. His face was thin, his forehead contracted, his chin peaked, his nose large, his mouth wide, his teeth black and decayed, and his eyes small and red. Having given his directions, as soon as he had leisure he dressed, or rather undressed himself, that he might look respectable before the ladies; that is, he pulled off two jackets, the first exceedingly thick and weather proof, two pairs of trowsers, and his boots, which hung loose about his legs. He then appeared in a grey damask doublet, made probably from his great-grandmother's holiday gown, long quartered shoes, and a pair of pewter single-tongue buckles, extravagantly large, and diamond cut. He had a gigantic kind of sleeve-button to fasten his waistband, and another of the same form but less, at his shirt collar; these, by their embossing, equalled his buckles in splendour; and in his now reduced size, he accurately resembled the wooden men cut in Dutch toys. I found amusement in studying this figure, it being the first of the kind I had seen. His language was low Dutch, but he spoke broken English; and I endeavoured to make him talk; but, as he knew nothing, he could say nothing. The office of pilot frequently r a great presence of mind, activity, and courage: this man certainly no such qualities.

Under his guidance, however, we entered the Elbe; and the shores of Holstein on the left, and Hanover on the right, began to appear upon us. I know not when or how it came there, but the scene I had in my mind of Holstein, was that of one of the rude naked countries of the North; and I felt surprise, as we approached its banks, to see them frequently adorned with houses of brick, and the gable ends painted green. This, however, afterwards found, is by no means the general style of building at province; but it appears that men every where take delight in having pleasant habitations on the banks of rivers. At this part of the Elbe, the left hand shore had a flat and low appearance; while in Hanover we could see, not mountains, for there are none in these parts of Germany, but high lands. I know not why, the traveller appears to have a latent expectation that every thing which he is to see, is to be unlike every thing he has seen; and is almost disappointed to find that trees are trees, and that the shores of rivers in foreign countries are as verdant as those of his native land. It is true, there are in reality marked differences; these must be sought for in the minutest parts, and not in the grand features of nature, some few and singular instances excepted.

The Elbe cannot be navigated in the dark, for the buoys and marks cannot be discerned; and at twilight we cast anchor. Here the sailors did not repine: it was a necessity to which they were obliged to submit; but we, impatient passengers, heard with regret that the wind blew peculiarly fresh and fair. In the middle of the night it strengthened, and opposed the tide; in consequence of which, the waves rose, and the ship rolled violently. Doors open, boxes and bottles tumbled from their places, and there was a great clatter in the cabin. It seemed strange to be so much disturbed, having now passed the sea, and safely arrived in the river. Trifles, to which we are unaccustomed, excite surprise."

LETTER VII.

THE anchor was weighed as early as possible; for it was still doubtful whether we should arrive at Hamburg before the close of the day.

"According to regulation, the pilot from the red buoy has a right only to proceed to a certain distance; after which, another, if he be in readiness, comes on board and takes charge of the vessel. Our little man was very anxious in his hopes that a successor would not appear; and that he should have the whole profit of proceeding to Hamburg. But he was disappointed. At the proper station his rival came; and he returned. The second pilot was no less characteristic in manner and appearance than the first; though very different. His dress, indeed, was nearly the same; but instead of the insignificance of the former, he had an assuming deportment; which, agreeing with the costume, made me imagine I was actually in company with ancient Pistol. With his pipe in his mouth, his wide, straddling gait, and his hands in his breeches' side-pockets, commanding with a kind of bluff authority, and speaking a half unintelligible jargon, the picture was almost complete. His son was with him; a young boy, the likeness and the age of his father. The decayed state of this man's teeth, made me conjecture that smoking might be a principal agent in producing this defect, which I afterwards found to be common among the Germans.

"This man, however, had activity in his profession; and it was fortunate that he, instead of the former, was our pilot: for, in going up the river, had not he and all the crew strongly exerted themselves, we might have been run down by the aleghish neglect of a Dane; which danger we escaped with great difficulty.

"As we proceeded, the appearance of the opposite shores considerably varied; we lost sight of the distant high lands in Hanover, and saw nothing but a dead and low flat; while the Holstein bank became elevated, the number of the green-ended houses increased, and the town and fortifications of Gluckstadt came in view. It is low, and we could see little of the palace of which our pilot vaunted. We discerned nothing that in the least approached magnificence; but saw many things that had a charming air of rural calm and cleanliness. These pleasing appearances became more frequent as we approached Altona; but we could not sufficiently enjoy them, for it was now once more the close of day. Being at Altona, we were glad, though surprised, to find ourselves within a gun-shot's distance of Hamburg: but our joy on this occasion was short; for we heard, with vexation, that the gates of mburg, as well of the port as of the city, were regularly shut at k; and that admission, even for a prince, was then impossible. Altona, like Hamburg, is a seaport town; and it may safely be phesied, that at no very distant period they will form but one ce. The number of shipping at Altona was considerable, ough small when compared to those that crowded the harbours Hamburg. But the appearance that catches the eye, and inguishes these cities from all that I had before seen, was the essive quantity of windows in the houses*; the front surfaces which are nearly one half of glass. I had remarked the upper ies of certain manufacturing houses in London, that have rows windows in the same manner; and inquired if the houses I v saw were all manufactories? It was a question the sailors ld not answer, but I afterwards found that every house was is constructed.

"About nine o'clock, we came to moorings in the river without : harbour; exceedingly mortified at being obliged to sleep oth night on board, knowing that every thing to give us pleasant reception had been prepared by our friends on shore. pectation is whetted by difficulty and delay: yet expectation, thout these stimulants, is generally too high. We were soon to on German ground; and Germany is one of the grand divisions Europe, renowned for its ancient resistance to the Roman arms; d claiming, in modern times, not only the destructive honours of r, but a high rank in every department of science and belles tres; we should therefore find it peopled with the learned, the lite, and the brave. With these, and a thousand other grateful ages, we appeased our impatience, and once more waited the urn of day. How eager is man for the future, — how insensible the present! — Had he the power, how would he lend wings to ae, and wish his life away!"

LETTER VIII.

HE morning came, the captain ordered out his boat, and we had rely patience to descend into it with care. The fleet that had ived had to find berths in the harbour: ships must change their ions; some to depart, others to load or unload: the boats and ges employed seemed almost as numerous as the ships themselves : multitudes of the peasants that inhabit the banks of the Elbe, who, from necessity, are both watermen and farmers, were arriving, male and female, in their skiffs, to provision the devouring city : all was life, all was motion ; and we, rowing in the midst of the scene, had our faculties wholly absorbed by the countless novelties that at once invaded them. The animation of the Elbe cannot indeed be said to equal that of the Thames : but then the objects were so different, and their appearance generally was so uncouth and boorish, that the eye was bewildered, and unable to examine them individually.

* There is no window-tax in Germany.

"We were stopped at the entrance of the harbour by the voice of a sentinel, and questioned concerning who we were, and what our trunks contained ; but this is rather a form than a scrutiny ; for few ports are so free of access, or give so little trouble with respect to custom-house duties, as that of Hamburg. The government of Hamburg, comparatively, has laid but few restraints upon trade : that is, it has practised fewer of the vices of finance common, more or less, to all governments, which absurdly rob, by their endeavours to enrich, themselves. We landed on the Vorsetzen, at the principal stairs of the harbour, and were immediately struck by their inconvenience : they were narrow, steep, and dangerous, especially to persons carrying luggage. The krahnszieher, or city porters, perceiving we were English, and unacquainted with the place, pressed their service upon us, which we eagerly enough accepted ; and having landed our trunks on the quay, one of them went for a coach, and another for a car, to remove us and our effects. We intreated them to make haste, which they promised ; and, though they kept us waiting in vexation above half an hour, they might still be said to keep their word : as Germans, they were quick. We had, indeed, heard much of the inflexible phlegm of this people, but as yet we were novices in its practical effects. While we stood watching our luggage, gazed at and gazing, the appearance of those around us strange to us, and ours to them, among other things that attracted attention were two waggons, if they might so be called, that met ; and though the street, speaking of Hamburg, was tolerably wide, could scarcely pass. Each was drawn by four horses, two abreast, the driver riding on the near or left hand shaft-horse ; each had four wheels, and not two feet broad at the bottom, though both were uncommonly long ; the axle-trees projected above a foot on each side ; in short, nothing could be more ill constructed for turning and passing in narrow streets convenience which would have resulted from their small width wholly destroyed by the projecting axle-trees; the rope-har was so long, and the horses drew at such a distance from each; as at once to employ the space of drawing abreast, and what nearly sufficient to have drawn lengthways. This, added to length of the waggon, the awkwardness of the drivers, and the unconcern with which they sat and looked, when they had jostled each other, before they determined how they would combine and harmonising with other appearances around us, immediately gave birth to much surmise and meditation on national character. It was heightened, too, by the contents of one of the wagons, which was loaded with the filth and ordure of the city, as offensive almost to the sight as to the smell. Let us not, however, be too hasty in our conclusions; the detail of facts as they arise will best explain the real state of things: individually they may mislead; but collected and compared, they must elucidate.

It is true, the next I have to relate is of the unfavourable . Three of the krahnziehers harnessed themselves to the car drew our luggage; the distance they had to take it might be over seven hundred yards, and a porter in London would willingly have done the whole work for three shillings; but their demand was twelve. It is true, three of them thought proper to employ themselves, and they rendered that which might have been easily expeditious, laborious and slow. Neither was their demand justified; one third was abated: but then they supposed themselves paid no more than their due, and were dissatisfied that cabs were not taxed higher. It is said, indeed, and I suppose so, that throughout Germany labour is nowhere so extravagantly high as in Hamburg: but a comparative estimate of the rate of hire is much wanted; for it is a subject on which there are many gross mistakes. In proportion as the inhabitants of a country are ignorant, labour is supposed to be cheap; the very reverse is generally the truth."

Letter to Mr. Freeman.

SIR,

"Bath.

"I had once the pleasure of receiving a very humane and sensible letter from you on the part of my father. After the character he has given of you, I do not wonder at it. Benevolence and wisdom frequently are, and ought always to be, united. I am now to address you on his behalf. He informs me he is indebted to you to the amount of ten pounds, which was lent to him in necessity, and which I assure you is remembered by him with gratitude : it is an affair that, if I am not mistaken, does honour both to you and him. He is very anxious to have you satisfied that you shall not suffer for your generosity. I have it not in my power, without great inconvenience, to discharge the debt just at present, though it is a burthen which I wish to take from my father. I shall be enabled within this year, that is, at the beginning of next November, to pay it. I am secretary to a society which allows me that sum ; and which, if you will accept of my note, or a draft payable at that time, shall be appropriated to this use. I shall be glad if you will favour me with a line respecting the affair ; and after begging you will accept my most sincere thanks for the obligations I owe you on my father's account, take the liberty to subscribe myself, &c.

"January 9. 1779."

To Mr. Richard Hughes.

"Barnstaple.

"SIR,

"I shall execute with pleasure any little commands you will please to favour me with, and beg you will not suppose it any obligation. I have inquired concerning a first singer, but hear of none except Mr. Cubitt. I have not applied to him, because I am told he has been with you before, and that he seldom visits one company twice. If you want a capricious hoyden, who values herself upon her character and virtue, yet walks about the town in men's clothes, with a long stride, and a fierce cocked hat ; who has more spirits and as many antics as an ape or a tumbler ; who is a coquette this minute, and a prude the next ; raps out a great oath now, and anon reads you a lecture upon propriety and decorum ; talks to herself, at herself, of herself, and never for five minutes together upon any other subject ; who affects the girl, and whose wrinkles are as apparent as her vanity ; who yet does every manner she is with considerable service, by the singularity of her character, and the free airs she gives herself among the men ; who on the stage has considerable merit in breeches parts, coquettes, &c., but who will be Wall and Moonshine, or haunt you both sleeping, and waking ; in short, if you want a person who is sentimental, dissipated, reserved, obliging, talkative, sullen, laughing, pouting, and all in less time than I could copy this period ; who has many indications of strong sense, and more of absolute insanity ; whose heart would direct her to do right, but whose vanity will not permit her ; I say, if such a person pleases you, then take Mrs. H. If you suspect me of pique or ill-nature while I have been painting this picture, you wrong me. I have not, nor is it probable I ever should again have, occasion to associate with Mrs. H. If she should say it were a bad likeness, I will mend the copy when she mends the original. We have a new after-piece of Mr. Sheridan's coming out this evening, 'The Critic,' from which we expect great things. Pray give my best respects to Mrs. Hughes, and believe me to be sincerely yours,

"T. H.

"Oct. 30. 1779."

To Mr. Holcroft.

"MY DEAR FATHER,

"I am glad the trifle I sent came safe to hand. Mr. Freeman's receipt is sufficient. You did not mention whether Mr. Freeman still continues your friend. I wish you would be kind enough to let me know whether you have all your garden ground, and your bed of asparagus still, and what you chiefly depend on for your livelihood. Let me beg of you not to be unhappy. When you can no longer make up your payments, give up your all and come to me. I have told you frequently, and I cannot repeat it too often, I will never see you want. I am afraid you think the little I have hitherto done for you an obligation : I think I discover it in your letters. Let me entreat you, do not consider it in this light. You cherished me in infancy, and I should be very wicked to see you perish in age ; you loved me then, and I love and reverence you now. I will show you how sincere I am in my professions, the moment I have it in my power. I am exceedingly concerned for my poor mother's afflictions ; I hope she endures them with patience and fortitude, which alone can alleviate and make them lighter. I was not at home when your friends from Bath called ; I should have been happy to have seen them, but they never came again. I hope you bear the burthen of old age cheerfully ; nothing but indifference to the accidents of life can make them supportable. Life itself, in the wisest, happiest, and longest lived, is short, uncertain, and chequered with good and evil; a kind of dream that ends in a profound sleep. You are travelling towards the grave, and I am following you very fast, nay, possibly may finish the journey before you; but let us not be unhappy on that account; we shall rest from our labours, while our sons and daughters in numberless succeeding generations shall toil in the same steps, have the same hopes and disappointments, and sink at last into the same forgetfulness. Life is an April day; if we are impatient and out of humour, it is overcast with tempests, clouds, and rain; but if we bound our desires, and are cheerful, sunshine and serenity prevail. Mrs. Holcroft and the three little ones are all well, as are all friends, who frequently inquire after you. You would be delighted with the children, especially the boy, who is a fine little fellow, reads well, and is learning French and Latin."

To Mr. Holcroft.

"King's Mead Square, Bath.

"MY DEAR FATHER,

"I take great pleasure in hearing of your welfare, and that you are not likely to become unsettled again, which, if I had not a house to invite you to, would give me great pain to reflect on, more especially at your time of life. I cannot tell you how much I respect Mr. Freeman: he certainly must be a very benevolent, worthy man; and I beg you will assure him from me that he shall be certain not to lose the least part of the sum he has lent you; and that I am ready to give him my notes, if he pleases to accept of them, for the payment at such stated periods as I find myself able to pay them at. Your property in your garden, and your own integrity, dear sir, are sufficient security; but I would willingly remove every burthen from your shoulders, as well as give Mr. Freeman every certainty in my power. I am every day more esteemed; and I believe, if I have life and health, there is little doubt of my success. I hope, sir, you will not think me rude in cautioning you not to be too eager in increasing your stock; as by having more affairs on your hands than your small capital can supply, you may easily lose the whole; besides that you bring a degree of trouble and anxiety on your mind that your health cannot now support perhaps. I am exceedingly glad to hear that my mother is better. We are all in good health, our relations dine with us on Sunday, and we always speak of you. Mr. Marsac is not arrived. My comedy is to be played next season. God bless you both, and make you happy. I am, dear father, &c.

"March 31st."

To Fulke Greville, Esq.

"SIR,

"Before I proceed to any other subject, permit me to assure you that I not only think myself greatly honoured by your correspondence, but greatly obliged by your remarks, and more especially by the candour and liberality with which they are made. Indeed, sir, these sensations have made too powerful an impression to be soon or easily forgotten. Your ideas of consistency, however I may have failed, agree entirely with mine; for which reason, whenever you find absurdities or inconsistencies, I shall be glad if you will freely point them out. Your objection to 'The Two Knights' is well founded. I will make Sir Harry a lord, or Sir Hornet a Mr. —. Vandervelt is in the same predicament. A large fortune, and the illiterate manners of Turnbull, are sufficiently improbable, unless what Osborne says, when he draws his character in the first act, reconciles it to truth. I think your hint, however, a good one, and worth attending to. If any phrases, words, or other alterations of that nature occur to you in reading, I beg you will not scruple to write them on the blank leaf, being convinced that you have too much candour to take offence if I should happen to differ with you occasionally. If you understand that Sir Hornet sends the Turnbells to his nephew's house as a residence, I have erred in expressing myself, and must correct. The last thing you have noticed I confess affects me a good deal. I thought I had contrived the plot so as to keep the audience in suspense relative to the real character of Osborne; if I have failed in this, the error is a capital one indeed. It is true I could not make Osborne a rascal so palpably as to take away all probability of the contrary, because the mind would have been too much shocked at the want of poetical justice in the denouement; the point to be hit was, that perplexity which must arise in the mind on seeing a worthy person likely to be betrayed by an unworthy one; but yet to preserve a possibility of his salvation by having a possibility of your suspicions supposed unworthy one ill founded. Now to certain manner intimately in the mechanical secret of plot and catastrophe, I hardly know how this is to be effected. You, sir, know a comedy must end happily, because critics have made it an itable rule. You see, as you proceed, there is no way of doing but by making a certain character (Osborne for instance) what he appears to be: you foresee, therefore, this will happen, and your concern for the distress of another vanishes. But in that labyrinth shall the poet bewilder you, sir, who are possessed this clue! If the whole audience see as far as you, sir, my play deserves half its merit. The work in question was to be a comedy, the auditors were to laugh; wit, humour, variety of character, of manners, of incident, were absolute requisites for a good comedy, and as entirely so as instruction and reformation from the fable and moral. The poet's attention must, therefore, inevitably be divided: he must bestow a part on each. If the catastrophe of my play is not more moral, more forcible, and more affecting, than that of any late production, it is worse than any of them, because the plot has greater capabilities; but the nature of the work would not permit it to be as much so as if it had had but one whole and undivided intention, that is, as if it had been a tragedy. Do not imagine, sir, that I am seized with the irritability of authorship: whenever I am chagrined it will be at myself for committing errors, not at others for telling me of them. I am afraid there is truth in your objection, though I confess I have been told by some readers they were entirely at a loss concerning the catastrophe till it happened; but it is evident they either said false, or were less discerning than you. Continue, sir, to tell me truth. They will not flatter me at the theatre. I will retrieve my errors where I can. I am concerned, however, sir, at giving you the labour of writing. You will be in town soon; or at Petersham I shall be proud to wait on you; you will give me your opinion with greater ease: I find already it will be of much service to me; and I repeat, I think myself greatly honoured, and indebted to that philanthropy which could prompt you so cheerfully to the present undertaking.

"I am, sir, &c.

"September 4th."

To the same.

“SIR,

“I have this moment received and read your last letter : your attention to me is not only an honour to me, but to yourself ; it expresses the anxiety of a generous mind. I continue to think that your suggestion of Osborne’s gratitude is a very happy improvement, and as such have endeavoured to give it all the expression and force I could from the mouth of Osborne. As to Sir Harry, he appears to me to be so overflowing with passion, that his turn is so sudden and unexpected, and he is so affected with Osborne’s friendship and virtue in disguise, and at the hideous danger he had just escaped, that, if I feel right, he cannot speak, except in exclamation. The difficulty of making impassioned characters say neither too little nor too much is, as you observe, exceedingly great : and the plot frequently obliges the author to say too much ; but it never fails in some degree to offend. I confess, sir, you almost terrify me about the loss of Melissa’s fortune, but I have no remedy ; the reason is what I gave you in my last conversation. Mr. Nicholson says, were it not done, he confesses he would not do it ; and yet, as it is at present managed, the effect is such that he can scarcely wish it undone ; nor does he mean to think there is much risk in it. He approved your before-mentioned hint concerning Osborne’s gratitude, exceedingly, and thought it very happy. I don’t know how enough to thank you for your kind offers concerning the prologue ; but Mr. Nicholson is at present about one, and had begun it before I received your letter ; how far it may succeed in mine or Mr. Harris’s opinion, I cannot yet predict ; but I am under no disagreeable concern on that subject, because I know Mr. Nicholson’s candour and good sense so well as to be certain, should it not chance to be happy, he will not suffer the least chagrin ; not to mention, sir, that I should be exceedingly sorry again to subject your performance to the caprice or ill taste of others, to which I myself, in this business, am entirely subjected. I have not yet seen Mr. Henderson : he is out of town.

“I am, &c.

“T. H.”

To the same.

"SIR,

"I am very much concerned at not knowing where which way to remit the copy of the comedy to you, being ignorant of where you are, or where this may find you. I went on Tuesday with it into Somerset Street, but found the house entirely shut. The trouble you have taken in reading and advising, demands every attention from me. It is to be played on Saturday the 1st. If you come to town, or can instruct me how to send the copy to you, I shall be happy. I assure you, sir, you can scarcely conjecture the trouble and chagrin attending things of this nature there have been three epilogues written before there was one to please the speaker; and at this instant I am not certain of finding any person to speak the prologue. Mr. Henderson said he could not please himself in it, and therefore declined it; and Mr. Lewis, to whom it was afterwards given, who fancies himself a critic, does not find opportunities enough of regaling his acquaintance in the upper gallery; whether he will or will not say it, is yet to be determined. There have been various alterations made in the play, and a very considerable one relative to the fate of Melissa's fortune, though your objection is not entirely obviated. I have written a speech for Sir Harry, on the effects of gaming consonant to the ideas you hinted as I could; and I believe it will have a charming effect. Your turn, too, for the denouement is now exceedingly happy. I can only add, sir, that I think myself exceedingly obliged to you for these favours, and shall take the earliest opportunity when you are in town, with your permission, of thanking you in person.

"I am, sir, &c."

To the same.

"SIR,

"I am exceedingly happy that you do not suspect me of ingratitude: indeed, sir, I should detest myself had I, by my neglect, treated you with the least disrespect. It would have been a symptom not only of an inflated, silly mind, but of a bad heart also. I repeat this, sir, because I assure you I was very uneasy at the receipt of your obliging letter removed my doubts. I can only help again observing to you, sir, that the approbation of people of known worth and undoubted abilities is very flattering; and I am sure there will be nothing wrong or indelicate in saying that I self peculiarly happy and elevated at having gained the esteem Mr. and Mrs. Greville ; and I am certain I shall neglect no opportunity of endeavouring to improve a friendship so honourable as, and, at one period of my life, so seemingly incompatible. I now, sir, the most effectual mode of accomplishing this will be to my duty in society, and assiduously to cultivate such talents as accident or nature has bestowed upon me ; and this, sir, is my most anxious intention. Respecting the play, I, sir, was never satisfied in making Sir Harry lose his sister's fortune ; besides that I find in an incident in 'The tragedy of the Gamester,' where, as the hero does not survive the dishonour, it is very proper and happy. However, as few are sufficiently refined to feel properly on this occasion, it has a good stage effect. You can hardly conceive how great the effect of the denouement was on the first night ; the whole house seemed taken by surprise ; and Osborne's generous account of the reason of his conduct greatly heightened, or rather gave a complete finish, to their pleasure. There is another speech, which was written in consequence of some hints I received from conversing with you, which I think one of the best conceived in the whole play. It is Sir Harry's soliloquy in the fourth act, after Melissa has put her fortune in his hands. I very much approve what you are pleased to term the niceties of verbal criticism. An exact and well-regulated machine depends as much, if not more, upon small things as great ; but still there must be vast labour and precision needed, if no particle of dust insinuates itself among the cogs and wheels ; however, when such is discovered, it would be folly not to push it away. The epilogue I wrote, and it has a good effect in making. The curtailings have some of them been suggested at rehearsals by the performers, and some were my own, but the earliest part were Mr. Harris's. I dislike Sir Harry's squeezing Maria's hand, as much as you can do ; I assure you, sir, it was the action of the actors : and I chose rather to submit to that, and many other things I disapproved, than to appear obstinate or opinionated. Mrs. Holcroft desires me to assure you, sir, she is exceedingly obliged by the kind mention you have made of her, and only wishes it were possible to have an opportunity of expressing her gratitude in actions both to you and Mrs. Greville ; at this she despairs of.

"I am, sir, &c.

"Oct. 22."

To Mr. Freeman.

" Bath—

"To a heart like mine, addicted, both by principle and constitution, to the glowing emotions of friendship, the philanthropy and warmth of sentiment so conspicuous in your letters, and particularly in your last, are very acceptable. And though I have not leisure to answer you so fully as I wish, nor opportunity to return those many kindnesses you do me, yet to be totally silent would be ungrateful. Let me therefore return you my most sincere thanks for all your favours, particularly for those done to my father; believe me, sir, they shall never be forgotten. You are pleased to style yourself my friend, and I am proud of the appellation: the friendship of good men is not to be obtained upon slight and trivial terms: they know not only their own worth, but that the merits or demerits of those to whom they apply that serious and respectful word, are in a great measure reflected back upon themselves; and this makes them cautious. For my own part, sir, small as my consequence is in this world, nothing but a thorough conviction of the goodness of a man's heart could make me accept him for my friend. I am convinced you think in this like me; and I esteem your friendship, sir, and the friendship of men like you, too highly ever to wilfully make myself unworthy of it. Men who feel the dignity of virtue are too proud to be vicious. Excuse this, sir; I only mean to assure you I will endeavour to equal the good opinion you are pleased to entertain of me, and not to write my own eulogy."

To the same.

"DEAR SIR,

"I received yours of the 25th in due course, and have forborne to answer it till now, because I had not money to pay any part of the account before. As soon as I go out to-day I shall pay ten pounds in part to Mr. Ellis, and hope to pay as much more in a few weeks; should you think this too tardy, be kind enough to hint as much, and I will endeavour to quicken my motions. Had I any means of conveyance, I would send you a book just published (by me) in French and English, very curious:—'Mémoires de Voltaire écrits par lui-même.' If you will be kind enough in your next to inform me who in London sends you parcels oftenest, I can take occasion and then to send you such trifles as I have any concern in. I complain in London of literary envy among literary men, and am with reason; but our men of letters are far behind those of France in that particular; parties there are as high among the learned, as here among politicians. Their passions are sudden, their wit keen, and their tongues imprudent; all these must have exercise; and as they dare not, like us, talk of beheading prime ministers, tell kings they are fools, and regulate the affairs of nations, they are all judges of wit, taste, poetry, and the belles lettres, and much in the same proportion as we are of politics; that is to say, there are a thousand who affirm and dogmatise, for one who discriminates and judges with temperance and taste. Their authors of the present century, who have been famous, are most of them dead or old, and they themselves say they have little hopes from any of the rising generation: but this is a common-place complaint of all ages, and I have no doubt is without foundation now or heretofore. Notwithstanding their universal pretensions to discriminate and decide in works of wit and taste, the common people are very ignorant and ill-educated, insomuch that you will see, in the best streets of Paris, the inscriptions on the signs frequently mis-spelt; which is matter of astonishment to an Englishman, who seldom sees such a thing even on a village chandler's shop sign. I have written the above sketch in obedience to a wish expressed in your last; it is hasty and slight, for I am pressed at present for time, as indeed I generally am. My father is at present in Manchester; but he has taken a cottage in Cheshire, whither he and his wife are going in a few days. In his last he desired me to give you his kindest love and sincerest thanks to you and your family, for all your kindness and goodness to him; he likewise wishes to know who is Mr. F——'s successor, and if it is necessary he should come to Bath at the expiration of his lease. A line when you have leisure, sir, will be very acceptable to your sincere friend, and obliged humble servant,

"T. H."

To Mr. Professor Dugald Stewart.

"DEAR SIR,

"I have treated you with seeming disrespect, by neglecting to answer your letter. This is a thing I should be ashamed of with any person, and especially with one who I believe deserves the best esteem of the best men. Hear what I can urge in mitigation, and I hope to obtain your pardon. Your letter arrived just at the moment when my opera of 'The Noble Peasant' was in rehearsal; and I exceedingly hurried and teased not only with attending every day at the theatre, but with alterations, writing new songs, new scenes, making retrenchments &c. &c. to suit the circumstances of introducing this performance leaving out that, and so on; by which you will readily conjecture I was not idle: add to which the necessity of supplying printers with copy of 'Les Veillées du Chateau,' which I am translating. I even began this letter yesterday, but was cut short at the word teased in the last paragraph, par un impertinent, and was obliged to defer the subject till this morning. My defence is ended, which I even plead guilty, but hope you will find lenity not ill-stowed. M. de Bonneville has been several months at Evreux. I wrote letter after letter, and received no answer, till at last I grew very seriously uneasy. My letters lay at Paris for him; he is returned, has written, and I am recovered of my fears. I believe, sir, you know how deeply I am interested in whatever concerns Monsieur de Bonneville. At present, or rather at the moment I wrote, he was severely afflicted with the tooth-ache; but though a terrible evil while it lasts, is not I hope a lasting evil. I shall transcribe your kind expressions concerning him in my next, for which give me leave to thank you: I assure you they gave me pleasure; yes, sir, great pleasure. My delay has had a good effect; had I written sooner I could not have told you who he was, or if anywhere. I received his letter on Thursday last, and shall write in a few days, and would advise you, sir, to do likewise: your letter will be sure to reach him if you direct to him 'Chez Monsieur Barrois le jeune, Libraire, Rue de la Paix à Paris.' You are kind enough to say, sir, you will call on me when you come to London. I have a house and table, sir; and such as they are, if you will do me the honour of making them your own while you stay, be it short or long, I shall remember the favour: this said in plain and simple sincerity, and not in compliment. If you should see Mr. Robertson, junior, pray present my kind respects

"I am, &c.

"T. H."

*From Madame de Genlis.

" SIR,

" With pleasure, as well as gratitude, I acknowledge the receipt of the translation you were pleased to send me, which came to hand prior to your letter, and consequently before I could well go to make my claim. I have not yet had time to peruse it, but by the preface I am surprised to find you have omitted some incidents in the tales of 'Eglantine' and of 'Pamela' which in this country have created universal interest. Even the journalists, from whom I had little reason to expect mercy, owing to the severity with which they are treated in my works, have with one accord praised the expunged passages. I mention this to you with the less reserve, because those very passages are not of my own invention, which may be seen by referring to the notes relative to them. I have besides given the place of Madame Busca's residence; a number of persons have been to see her, and have satisfied themselves of the truth of my statement. Woe be to the false delicacy which is unable to endure a recital honourable to humanity, when made with an appeal to the feelings powerful enough to command tears! However, sir, be persuaded that I entertain a lively sense of the very great attention you have otherwise shown me, as well as of the handsome, and by far too flattering encomiums you have passed on my feeble productions. My motives are pure, and I have courage enough to tell truths likely to prove beneficial: — my writings will corrupt no one; — this is the only merit I am anxious to claim for myself; and indeed in our days it is sufficiently rare to satisfy its possessor.

" There is now in the press a new edition of the 'Théâtre d'Education,' to which I have added another volume, consisting of pieces taken from the Scriptures. This new edition will appear in the course of May next, and I beg your permission, sir, to forward you a copy, as a small token of my gratitude, and of the sentiments with which I have the honour to be, sir, your very humble and very obedient servant,

" DUCREST GENLIS.

" Belle Chassée, 22nd Feb. 1785."

* This letter is a translation from the French.

To Madame de Genlis.

" I HAVE received your favour, madam, and am happy to find the books came safe to hand. As to the retrenchments you are pleased to notice, I will not pretend to justify either my own false delicacy or that of my nation; but I can affirm, that be it false or true, it exists, and that to an English reader, I have done the book a service, and no injury. A person of your genius, madam, need not appeal to the approbation of journalists (I speak generally); however, if that were any consolation, I can likewise plead their support on this very subject, as you will see if you will please to read the 'Critical Review' for February last; but I would rather have given you satisfaction, madam, than fifty reviewers. You may well imagine, madam, I acted for the good of the work, according to the best of my judgment, but I will by no means presume that judgment infallible. Permit me, madam, to relate a short story. A certain young nobleman was remarkable for the elegance of his dress, the symmetry of his person, and the refinement of his manners. The old ladies admired him, the young ladies loved him, and even the handsomest among the men envied him. He was the chief inventor of modes, the leader of fashions, and the arbiter of taste and tailors; above all, he was remarkable for a fine head of hair. Proud of his power, and conscious of his abilities, his ambition was insatiable. One day, while waiting for his hairdresser, he happened by some odd accident to be turning over the leaves of a folio, in which he saw engravings of Eastern habits. He burst into a laugh: 'What strange figures!' cried he; 'how little do they understand of grace and elegance! Were I among them, I would soon teach them better.' Full of this idea, and urged by a thirst of still superior fame, he determined to take a voyage to China, in order to begin by humanising and converting that vast empire to the principles of good taste. Arrived at Pekin, and being a master of his art, his first endeavour was to gain the suffrages of the fair sex: to effect this, he assailed, and hoped to captivate, the daughter of a mandarine, acknowledged to be the greatest beauty in all Pekin, and, as her admirers daily swore, in all the world. Much depended on a first impression, and this he knew; he therefore pared his nails and powdered his hair, and some add, perhaps maliciously, painted his cheeks. Full of the embrance of former celebrity, and elate with the consciousness of perfect perfection, he walked up to the glass, admired the image reflected, and with the step of ease and self-approbation, called his palanquin, and proceeded on his visit. Thus prepossessed, he could not describe his surprise and chagrin, when, instead of finding the approbation he thought so certain, he heard the beautiful Chinese, though struck with his fine form (for proportion never please), find fault with that European art, — that taste which he had held so irresistible; the smart, short cut of his hair, which he suffered a thousand ridiculous comparisons; and his frizzed powdered hair, so bushy and so full, afforded endless laughter. Circumstantial detail is needless. The European, when he beheld the Chinese in their own country, and in great numbers, did not find their fashions so absurd as he thought them in an evening. He fell desperately in love with the mandarine's daughter, and consented to cut off his fine hair except a single lock, to let his nails grow, and wear a long vest; for without such concession he found it impossible to win the affection of his mistress; and, in fact, he translated himself into a Chinese. Truth and nature are the same in all countries, but the mode of decoration varies in each. This, I hope, madam, will be a sufficient apology for any occasional liberties I may have taken with your very estimable work, and which, notwithstanding, I believe few people think so highly of as I do, because few have studied its numerous excellences with such minute attention. There is a new edition now in the press, and I shed tears daily over the proofs as I read. I shall receive the favour of your 'Théâtre d'Education,' with respect and thanks such a present, coming from such a person, deserves.

"I am, madam, &c.

"T. H."

To Fulke Greville, Esq.

DEAR SIR,

"When I returned from Blackheath, I found your kind letter, in which you speak in that mild and true spirit of philosophy which is worthy of a liberal and philosophic mind. Proof respecting the subject in question (instinct) is not to be had. To me the sciences seem less to suppose the actions of all animals the consequence of reflection, than to suppose them blind impulse. I care not a farthing, whether my opinion be right or wrong : but while it is my opinion, however weak or absurd it may be, I will never pretend to a conviction I do not feel : and in this I am sure to meet your approbation, because a contrary conduct would be contemptible. A hen that has chickens, rakes up a barley-corn on a dung-hill, and stands clucking over it till her brood come round her. I could as soon suppose this an action of instinct, viz. an action without an intention, for that is what I understand by the word instinct ; I repeat, I could as soon suppose the hen acted from instinct, and without any idea passing in her mind, as I could at seeing a tomtit carry moss into the hollow of a tree for the safety of itself and young ; the action is much more complicated in the one case than in the other ; but I do not see that it warrants me to conclude the tomtit is acting without any intention. My mind revolts at the idea of a bird selecting a hole just capacious enough to creep into, remarking in what tree that hole happens to be, flying away and looking around for materials to make its nest, placing those materials in a certain form, leaving its mate to watch, and give notice if an enemy approach ; and going through a rational and well connected system, without rationality, and without meaning. It seems to me much less difficult to suppose the bird has a greater capacity than I am habituated to attribute to birds ; or that it learns to do these things from seeing others of the same species with which it lives in society do the like. Pray, sir, do me the justice to believe that I mean to give all this as mere opinion, and that I am superior to dogmatising. The fact you mention of the squirrel may, as you say, sir, if I am not mistaken, afford deductions for either side of the question. The first thing I should wish to inquire into would be, whether the squirrel had never been in company with other squirrels that had the like habits ; and, if that were proved against me, I should next inquire whether a young squirrel that had never been in company with any other squirrel did, the very first time it had nuts given it, go and seek for a corner to hide them ; and, if even this extraordinary thing were to happen, I should still be much more inclined to attribute it to the fears and cunning of the animal, than to suppose it went and came and knew nothing about the matter ; for so, I think, acting from instinct, or without intention, implies. Your Wilbury horses, sir, are surely on my side of the question, and my very good friends on this occasion, or I am once more egregiously deceived. They not only choose to leave the heat and retire to the shade, but they moreover select that part of the shade which suits them best; that is, where they are least annoyed by flies. Just so an over-roasted cook-maid retires behind her fire-screen: and if she happens to sit down on an uneasy chair removes to another, and gives the easiest the preference. Men play on the harpsichord and talk, as men walk and talk; i. e. the thing is so familiar, it employs only a part of their attention; but give them music which is too difficult for them, that is, which employs their whole attention, and I from experience will answer for their silence. The respect due to your friendly mode of arguing has occasioned me to do what I have a great aversion to, write a long letter. But however convinced you may be of the fallacy of my arguments, I hope I shall never give you cause to suspect the sincerity and friendship with which I am, and shall ever remain,

“ Your very respectful,

“ Humble servant,

“ T. H.

“ P.S. — I have sent you the magazine, and a volume of the Harleian manuscript, a very scarce, curious, and dear book, and hope it may afford something that will entertain. I have not got the other book: ‘ Lord Kaimes’s Sketches of Man’ is the title.”

To the Hon. Horace Walpole.

“ SIR,

“ The politeness with which I was received on my accidental visit to Strawberry Hill, in company with Mr. Mercier, and the pleasure I felt not only in viewing so rare a collection of the works of art, but in the very kind manner in which they were shown, will not easily be forgotten. As a small testimony of the truth of this, I then projected, and having received them from the binders, now take the liberty to send you copies of such dramatic works of mine as have been already played and published, which I beg you to accept, not as a task imposed upon you to read them, nor yet with an expectation of praise; but as an acknowledgment of as much thankfulness as I dare express. I have also enclosed a copy of a manuscript comedy, for which I can give no better reason, than that though every motive of delicacy would make me avoid laying you under the least restraint, yet it may happen that the perusal of it may afford you an hour's amusement, which is the best return I am at present able to make for the attention with which you were pleased to treat me, and the invitation you gave me to revisit Strawberry Hill in a more favourable season.

"I am, sir,

"Your very respectful, humble servant,

"T. H."

ANSWER.

To Mr. Holcroft.

"Berkeley Square, Nov. 28. 1788.

"THE civilities, sir, which you are pleased to say you received from me at Strawberry Hill, were no more than were due to any gentleman, and certainly did not deserve such acknowledgment as you have made; and I should be ashamed of you thanking me so much, if the agreeable manner in which you have greatly overpaid them by the present of your works did not make me easily swallow my shame, though it will not dispense me from assuring you how much I am obliged to you. I shall read them with pleasure as soon as I am settled in town. Just at present, I live between town and country, and should not have leisure but to read them by snatches. It is for this reason, that if you are not in haste for it, I shall beg leave to keep your manuscript comedy till I can peruse it with proper attention. If you should want it soon I will return it, and ask for it again; for it would be unjust to the merit of your works to run through them too rapidly.

"I am, sir, your obliged and obedient, humble servant,

"H. WALPOLE

To Mr. Holcroft, sen.

"August 31. 1791.

"MY DEAR FATHER,

"I have received both your kind letters, and hope you will excuse my not having answered you sooner; my delay having been occasioned by the intense application which I am obliged to pay to a work I am now writing. I imagine it will be printed about Christmas, and you shall receive an early copy. Nothing gives me greater pleasure than to hear of your good health. I convinced of the efficacy of sea-bathing, and am glad you are near enough to the sea to enjoy the benefit of it. Remember, my dear father, what I repeated to you, when I had last the happiness of your company. Keep your mind alive ; exercise every part of your body, fingers, joints, and muscles ; endeavour to infuse spirit and vigour into them, and depend upon it you will be surprised at the effects which will be produced. We die piece-meal, by falling into habits of apathy and neglect ; and by supposing that debility and inactivity are the inevitable consequences of age. The mind becomes weary of action ; it loses its desires, and the body sinks into listlessness, palsy, and universal decay. This I am persuaded is the error of a false supposition, that death is inevitable. Not that I would have you understand I myself think I shall not die : but I very sincerely think, when I do die, it will be of ignorance, and of the disease I have just mentioned ; accidents excepted.

“ You inquire, dear sir, whether I am married again. I cannot say what miracles may happen in the world ; but I really think I have had marriage enough for one man. The woman whom I could truly esteem is not easily to be found ; and, if the discovery were made, it would be strange if she were wholly disengaged. Your grandchildren are all in good health, and inquire after you very affectionately. Mrs. Colles and family are well, — she dined with us the Sunday before last. With respect to affairs, I am sorry for your sake, my dear father, that I am not so rich as I could wish. The only remedy is strict economy and hard labour ; both of which conditions I am obliged severely to comply with : but, far from being discontented, to be able to comply with them, to be rid of the false notions that fix felicity in the enjoyment of superfluous trifles, which none of us want, and to have a mind industrious, active, and delighting to produce, these things are to me happiness which may be almost called supreme. I shall for some months be exceedingly short of money ; but you shall nevertheless hear from me at the usual time. Pray remember me kindly to Mrs. Holcroft, and assure yourself that I shall always remain

“ Your dutiful and affectionate son,

“ T. H.”

From Mr. Shield.

"Turin, September 22. 1791.

"DEAR HOLCROFT,

"*

*

*

*

My health, since I left England, one day excepted, has been extremely good ; but passing the Alps, in the manner I did, was too much for me. I thought it degraded the race of men too much to suffer two of them to carry me in a sedan over this immense mountain : in consequence of which we had mules ; and, after riding about one mile, reflection told me that I was shortening the life of an animal, by obliging it to carry me up and down so many precipices ; and as I saw women walk it, I was resolved to do the same, for I was then in possession of the temper of the animal which I led, and would not yield to the entreaties of my fellow-travellers to remount. I was so much exhausted when I arrived at Laneburg, that I threw myself upon the bed ; soon after which, dinner was served up in the same room ; but my appetite had entirely left me through fatigue : my heart was good, but my strength failed me. However, after waiting for two hours for some very indifferent tea, it revived me a little, and I got into the coach, and was entirely recovered by the time we reached Turin. A man needs no common share of that inestimable quality which you so eminently possess (fortitude) to travel through the south of France and Savoy, with only a dozen words of the language. I thought change of scene would prove the best medicine for me, and I seem to have been right in my prognostications, for I find myself in the full possession of my faculties, and am determined to exert myself in my profession. A very accomplished Russian is my chief companion. But the greatest original of our voiture party is a Chinese, of a small stature, but of a capacious memory : he speaks the French, Italian, Spanish, German, Dutch, Russian, and Latin languages, so as to astonish the natives and students of the above. His character is so uncommon that, were you to draw him for the English stage, he must reside in London before the audience would acknowledge your character to be natural : most people like him, for the only indignity he has yet met with is his being taken for my valet, from his attention to me.

"Yours truly,

"W. SHIELD.

"P. S. I cannot view the beautiful scenes which at present surround me without recollecting the strokes of Milton's pencil in his sublime picture of 'Paradise Lost.'"

To Mr. Shield.

"London, Oct. 11. 1791.

"DEAR SHIELD,

"You cannot easily imagine the pleasure which your letter gave me. The passions, hopes, and alarms of the heart are necessarily excited in behalf of those for whom it has an affection by distance, and by its ignorance of the good or ill health, happiness, or misfortune of those it loves. I heard of you at Lyons, and for the moment was satisfied. I knew from the numbers who cross the Alps, that there would be little or no danger in traversing the tremendous Mount Cenis; yet I was anxiously desirous to hear you had passed it in safety. I have accompanied you in imagination, and looked down from its summit on the surrounding nations. Fanny supposes that, being placed there, the eye has a survey, as it were, of all Europe, though in reality its powers are too feeble to see distinctly and accurately at a few yards' distance; but fancy delights in these deceptions, nor can the scenery be other than sublime and astonishing. You are, at present, in what, perhaps, more than any other, may properly be called the country of contradictions. The noble works of art, of sculpture, of painting, and the monuments of architecture, which are to be met with in almost every city of Italy, form a surprising contrast to the ignorance, poverty, sloth, and present depravity of its inhabitants. Men, who by the baneful influence of priesthood and bad government, have, from the first of mankind, become almost the lowest. Sunk in ignorance, deprived of energy, destitute of all noble emulation, we ask, with amazement, how could a people like this produce works so magnificent; or tower, as they have done, above the rest of mankind? You are sensible, dear Shield, I now speak of them as a nation; there are, no doubt, individuals among them who still possess those powers, and that genius, of which the herd of their fellow citizens is deprived. They only wait a more happy moment, and return of times more fortunate, to become all that they have been, and I hope much more. I need not tell you the infinite pleasure it would give me, could I, at this moment, transport myself to the palace in which you lodge, for such no doubt it is, and accompany you in all your peregrinations : I have a very earnest desire to see Rome, that queen of cities, and take a view of all her treasures, which, as I am told, are so immense and multifarious, as presently to satiate the most inquisitive mind.

"Do not forget, dear Shield, to fix your attention on the various works of Michael Angelo; in painting, sculpture, and architecture, I am persuaded he was the first of modern artists. Nor must Raphael escape your notice. Rome, I am told, is the only place on earth to view his pictures, for all the best of them are there. I shall ask you a thousand questions concerning them on your return, and of the effect they produced upon you. The remains of ancient architecture: the Pantheon, Trajan's Pillar, the Castle of St. Angelo, &c. &c., you will certainly not forget. I should indeed prefer fixing my attention on a select few of the grandest objects, to that of dividing it into too many parts, and thus rendering it without efficacy. No passage in your letter gave me so much pleasure as that in which you tell me you are in full possession of your faculties, which you are determined to exert. The determination is well worthy of a mind like yours, Shield, which to possess, and not to employ, is, in my opinion, the true sin against the Holy Ghost; it is unpardonable. Familiarised as your mind at present is to harmony, and stored with musical ideas, what can be so desirable for the world, or so delightful to yourself, as to arrange those stores, to pour them forth, and to dig the gold from the mountain where, while it lies buried, it is worthless. Not that any accusation of the kind can be brought against you, yet, Shield, distance will authorise friendship in speaking a truth, which false modesty unjustly forbids us to repeat vivâ voce. Your works are already an honour to your nation and your art; and had you not been under the malignant influence of absurd prejudices, they would have been infinitely more honourable. We are, at present, all, more or less, under similar influences, and obliged to obey the dictates of necessity, I hope, however, that you will be less so in future than heretofore; and the end of my present very severe labours is to free myself from them, if possible. There needed not any caution relative to the newspapers: I believe you are too generally beloved to be in danger of attack; but should illiberality or envy show their fangs, be certain you will not want a defender. Forgive me, dear Shield, for not transcribing this letter myself;

my brain is exceedingly busy, and not a little fatigued ; you will see on what when you return to England. I am obliged to employ every moment in that severe labour which is requisite to form a consistent, efficacious, and excellent whole ; whether the work I am writing will be such, must be left to the proof, but such, at least, I must endeavour to make it, and I hope my efforts will not be unsuccessful. All good, all happiness, all pleasure be with you wherever you go.

“T. H.”

To Mr. Godwin.

“July 20. 1797.

“It was my intention to write, for I feel a kind of vacuity of heart, when I am deprived of the intercourse of my accustomed friends ; but as I cannot write to them all, and as we have many friends in common, I think there are few whom you may not safely assure on my part that they have their turn in my thoughts. I deferred this pleasant duty, however, till I had seen your mother, whom I thought it right and respectful to visit. My coming occasioned some little alarm ; the Major, Mrs. Harwood, and Fanny, accompanied me ; we were seen from the windows as we came up to the gate. I had my spectacles on, and your sister-in-law ran to inform your mother that yourself and Mrs. Godwin were arrived. The old lady stood in the portico ; the young one advanced ; there was an anxious curiosity in their countenances, and your sister said, addressing herself to me, ‘I think I know you, sir.’ I scarcely knew what to reply : imagination had winged her and myself up to London, where I supposed, some years ago, I might have seen her at your lodgings ; taking it for granted she was a relation : but as I did not answer, Major Harwood relieved our embarrassment by announcing my name. The change of countenance, perhaps, could not have fully persuaded her that my face was actually yours, yet she seemed rather to trust to her hopes than to her recollection ; and these being disappointed, an immediate blank took possession of her features, and the rising joy was damped. Your mother, however, very kindly invited us in, and gave us all the good things she had that could administer to our immediate pleasures. The expectation which Major Harwood had raised by his description of your mother were not entirely answered. She was neither so alert, so commanding, nor so animated, as he and Ann had described. I think her very rapidly on the decline; having quitted her farming business I have no doubt myself but that her faculties will be impaired much faster than they would have been had she continued to exert them. Her memory is good, her conceptions, speaking comparatively, are clear, and her strength considerable. I have seen more of the county of Norfolk than of its inhabitants; of which county I remark that, to the best of my recollection, it contains more churches, more flints, more turkeys, more turnips, more wheat, more cultivation, more commons, more cross-roads, and from that token probably more inhabitants, than any county I ever visited. It has another distinguishing and paradoxical feature, if what I hear be true: it is said to be more illiterate than any other parts of England, and yet I doubt if any county of like extent have produced an equal number of famous men. This is, however, merely a conjecture made, not from examination, but from memory. As it is necessary for me to bathe, I shall immediately depart for Yarmouth, and pass through Norwich, which I have not yet seen. If you, or Mrs. Godwin, or both, can but prevail on yourself or selves to endure the fatigue of writing to me, I hope I need not use many words to convince you of the pleasure it will give me: and be it understood that this letter is addressed to you both, whatever the direction on the back may affirm to the contrary. Professions are almost impertinent, and yet I am almost tempted to profess to you how sincerely and seriously I am interested in your happiness, but as I am sure my words would ill describe my thoughts, I shall forbear. Pray inform me, sweet lady, in what state is your novel? And on what, courteous sir, are you employed? Though I am idle myself, I cannot endure that any body else should be so. Direct to me at the post-office, Yarmouth."

To Mr. Holcroft.

"December 11. 1794.

"SIR,

"Were I not writing to Mr. Holcroft, I should think it needful to apologise for my abrupt self-introduction to you in London, and the liberty I now take in addressing you; but I trust you will not deem me impertinent, nor expect any professions to convince you of the esteem and admiration I have for your character. These sentiments induced me to visit you in your late unjust confinement, to be anxious for your safety, and sincerely to rejoice that you are now restored to your friends, and your extensive circle of usefulness. You may perhaps recollect the scheme* of which I gave you an imperfect outline; I much desired your opinion and advice on the subject; but your mind being then much engaged on its peculiar situation, I forbore to intrude the subject. Hoping you may now be happily settled at your rightful home, and believing you would be happy to assist me by advice, as well as enforce by precept any virtuous intention, I would engage your thoughts to our projected plan of establishing a genuine system of property. America presents many advantages to the accomplishment of this scheme — the easy rate at which land may be purchased is not the least important; yet we are not determined on emigration. Principle, not plan, is our object. A friend has suggested that the plan is practicable in some of the uncultivated parts of Wales. I recollect your expressing a desire that we might form such a society without leaving the kingdom. As we wish to consult all who may render our efforts more serviceable to the cause of truth and virtue, we should be happy if, in some unemployed hour, you would consider the subject, and impart to us any objection which may occur peculiar to the scheme of emigration. From the writings of William Godwin and yourself, our minds have been illuminated; we wish our actions to be guided by the same superior abilities; perhaps when together, you may bestow some thoughts to our advantage. To him, and your friend Nicholson, I would request the remembrance of an admirer. Long may they continue to instruct and amend mankind! If we could practise our scheme in this kingdom, it would save much expense, perhaps danger, and at the same time be more agreeable to our private inclinations; but the probability of being obnoxious to government, and subject to tithes, are in our opinions serious objections. I forbear to make any remark on the late trials, or formally to congratulate you on your acquittal. I hope the spirit of inquiry will be excited to advantage; perhaps you would rather have had your trial proceeded in; though the Court authority prevented your speaking, they cannot prevent you from printing your injured case. I am anxious to see your appeal on the subject.

“ When you address your charming daughter (Mrs. C., &

* The Pantisocracy Scheme.

Exeter), whom I saw with you, be good enough to make my remembrance. I wonder not at your drawing the charming character of Anna St. Ives, having so fair an original.

“ ROBERT LOVELL

“ No. 14. Old Market, Bristol, 1794.”

From Mr. Dermody.

“ London, June 15. 1794.

“ SIR,

From the universal celebrity of your talents, and the liberal spirit which breathes through all your productions, I am, though a stranger, emboldened to request your superior guidance in the paths of literature. Very little used to authorship as a trade, inexperienced in the polity of booksellers, and even unacquainted with the city itself, it would, I presume, be no dishonourable employment to direct a wandering muse, and you alone, sir, are the person I conceive (from general benevolence) best adapted to that task both by affability and experience. Without these two qualifications, you could not have written ‘ Alwyn,’ which, next to Fielding’s work, contains the most affecting and sportive scenes that ever adorned a novel. I have lately borne a commission in the army, and am, at present, under the patronage of a most learned and amiable nobleman; however, being formerly taught to believe that I had some talents, it is disagreeable to be unemployed with every faculty on the stretch for exertion. By that nobleman’s desire, I left a large poem, ‘ The Retrospect,’ with a printer of eminence in Pall Mall: but was much surprised to be informed yesterday that he had embarked for Italy, and the manuscript was locked up. I have but a very rough draught of it now till he returns. Your very great dramatic eminence might be of the most material benefit by pointing out the steps proper to be taken in a line of which I have been ever enamoured. If you deign to direct a short reply to this strange intrusion, I shall have the honour to lay a few pieces of poetry (which fortunately are correctly copied) before your judgment—meanwhile

“ I am, sir, with great respect,

“ Your obedient servant,

“ THOMAS DERMODY.

“ No. 30. Oxendon Street, Haymarket.”

From the Marquis Dampierre.

"Liege, 6 Xbre l'an 1^r de la République.

"DEAR HOLCROFT,

"I charge my dear friend, the young Mergées, my coun-men, to tell you that I never forgot our old friendship, he'll tell ou my profession of faith, upon the Revolution. He'll bring you relation of the victories of the French, and you'll see my part in
. I have the honour to conduct the liberty lads in the way of the ictory.

"Adieu, dearer among the dear,

"H. DAMPIERRE.*

"Maj. G. of the French Republic."

* The Marquis de Dampierre, with whom I was very intimate at Paris in 783. He received a mortal wound on the 8th of May, 1793, of which he died
1 the 10th, when he was Commander-in-Chief, and which battle the French ained.—T. H.

THE END.

LONDON:
SPOTTISWOODES and SHAW,
New-street-Square.

A FINE IS INCURRED IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW.

OCT 4 '75 H

495 2081

LIBRARY
JUL 30 1975

3 2044 024 489 494

HARVARD COLLEGE
LIBRARY

THE BEQUEST OF

EVERT JANSEN WENDELL

(CLASS OF 1882)

OF NEW YORK

1918

